TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. McKENNA (Monmouthshire, N.) moved to leave out of lines 9, and 10, after the word "licence," the words "shall be vested in quarter sessions instead of the justices of the licensing district." The effect of this Amendment would be to leave the control of the licences in the hands of the justices as at present. In every case the justices had local knowledge of the district over which they exercised jurisdiction, and their work on the whole had been satisfactory. There had been no recommendation in either of the Reports of the Royal Commission in favour of transferring the work of the justices to quarter sessions. What was proposed in the Bill was to remove the control from an administrative body and hand it over to the quarter sessions, who, according to the wording of the Act, were to act as a legal tribunal. If this proposal were adopted the real control over licences would be very much diminished, and all the elements of discretion would disappear. It was not necessary for him to quote the cases upon the authority of which it was established that quarter sessions now acted as a Court of Appeal. The justices were not a Court at all, and it was a very grave question of principle whether the control of licensing should be handed over from an administrative body to a Court of Law. There was an Amendment further down on the Paper which provided that quarter sessions should act as an administrative body, but it did not appear to be absolutely necessary that the Court of quarter sessions should be substituted for the licensing justices at all. He was aware that, inasmuch as the area of subscription to the compensation fund was considered to be at least of a size commensurate with the quarter sessions jurisdiction, it was thought, therefore, that the Court of quarter sessions should be the controlling authority and not the licensing justices, whose area of subscription would be very much smaller. That difficulty could very easily be met. The Court of quarter sessions might easily allot the amount of money to be used as compensation within the area of the particular justices' brewster sessions, and it was not necessary to transfer the whole of the licensing powers from the justices to quarter sessions. If quarter sessions had power of limiting the amount of compensation in any particular area it would be perfectly possible to leave the actual control of each licence to the licensing justices. He admitted that quarter sessions must be introduced if they were to have the area of quarter sessions as the area of subscription for the compensation fund. No doubt in certain cases the area over which the licensing justices had jurisdiction would be too small to provide adequate funds, but it was quite possible for the quarter sessions to determine what the proper amount was for each area of the licensing justices and allot that sum, and then the licensing justices should have jurisdiction in determining whether a licence should be discontinued or not. The proposal of the Government was to hand over the control of the licences from men who were thoroughly acquainted with the district to a body of gentlemen sitting at quarter sessions who were not, who could not know what were the particular requirements in the remote parts of the county, would be acting without the necessary local knowledge, and would be certain to discharge their duties less efficiently than would be done by the local justices. If the Government could not accept this Amendment in its present form, they might at least introduce words in order to leave unchecked the present jurisdiction of the licensing justices in their own area. If that were done, the Government would remove one of the most serious objections to the Bill, namely, that the justices who had hitherto done their work extremely well should not have withdrawn from them work which they had every reason to believe they would be able to continue to do thoroughly well. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 9, to leave out from the words last inserted to the word 'shall' in line 10."—(Mr. McKenna.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'shall' stand part of the clause."

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's) said the hon. Member desired to leave the decision in regard to the taking away of licences in the hands of the local justices. He had already anticipated the objection of the Government, which was that the authority which dealt with the compensation fund should be the authority to deal with the licences to be refused. The hon. Member urged that a certain amount of money should be allotted to each brewster sessions' area to compensate licence-holders in cases where licences were refused on the ground of public policy. He submitted that that course would not be at all reasonable or desirable. It would not work in practice. There would be some brewster sessions' areas where no, or a very small number of, reductions would be made; there would be others where the number would be considerable. The result would be very unequal distribution of the benefits of the Bill. Therefore, he thought it would be far better that the trust should be vested in quarter sessions, and that they should be the authority. He believed there would be a much more even distribution in that way of the reduction of licences all over the county.

LORD EDMUND FITZMAURICE said that, apart from the objections which had been so forcibly urged by his hon. friend, quarter sessions were a most unfortunate body to commit this jurisdiction to, because, since 1888, quarter sessions had not been an administrative body at all. Although technically, as had been pointed out, this was a judicial duty, still the matter was an administrative one. He asked the Home Secretary what staff quarter sessions had at the present moment in order to carry out these duties. Since 1888 their staff had consisted of the clerk of the peace and perhaps an officer to maintain order in Court when quarter sessions were sitting. Therefore, one objection, in addition to those already stated by the mover of the Amendment, he had to the proposal in the Bill was that quarter sessions would be compelled to take up administrative duties and appoint an administrative staff. That was a new venture and one which he ventured to think was most objectionable.

MR. BRIGG (Yorkshire, W.R., Keighley) said the machinery of quarter sessions had entirely gone out of use for collecting and distributing money in the way proposed in the Bill. The West Riding Sessions, with which he was most intimately associated, had passed a resolution to the effect that they did not see that they could possibly make use of the machinery now provided for this purpose and suggested that the county council was the proper body to be called upon to collect the money, while they themselves would deal, under the Bill, with the money so gathered. In order to perform the duties now to be placed upon them, it would be necessary to appoint a number of officials. He had an Amendment on the Paper that these duties should be carried out by the joint committee. He was sure that the quarter sessions could not deal with the work proposed to be committed to them with the staff they now had.

Mr. CRIPPS (Lancashire, Stretford) asked, on a point of order, if it would be open to the Committee on subsequent Amendments to discuss whether quarter sessions, or some other body, were to be the authority.

The CHAIRMAN: The point raised by this Amendment is that the authority is to remain as it is now. If the House does not think so, it is still open to the House to suggest any other authority—the standing joint committee, a committee of quarter sessions, or quarter sessions themselves. This will not affect the further Amendments.

Mr. CRIPPS said the present body was peculiarly unsuitable to be the authority on account of the area in which they acted being so small. That had been the great difficulty in carrying out any effective scheme of licensing reform. They could not carry out any effective scheme in a small area. In the county with which he was associated they did try to carry out a scheme of temperance reform, and they could have done it over the county at large, but they found they could not do it by dealing only with district areas. In order to carry out this Bill effectively, it was necessary to have a county scheme so that the whole county might be properly dealt with. He thought the Bill did not give sufficient power to the county authority. They ought to give the county authority, as against the smaller authority, power to do something definite in order to carry out a scheme which would do the best for temperance reform. It was important to have suitable administrative areas in which the magistrates might effectively carry out temperance reform.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. M'Kenna and Mr. Lambert.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey) said he wished to move an Amendment which concerned the county areas, and which he hoped would be taken into consideration by the Solicitor-General and the Home Secretary. He was not going to traverse the ground already gone over as to the disqualifications of the quarter sessions, but he submitted that the alternative he suggested was better than the one contained in the Bill as it now stood. As the Committee were aware, the joint police committee was elected—half by the quarter sessions, and half by the county council. It was a pretty well-known fact that in England and Wales the very best magistrates were selected to sit on the joint police committee; and he believed that most of the county council members of that committee were themselves magistrates. The joint police committee had the control of the police, and he submitted that it would be a most convenient thing that that committee should have control of the licences throughout the county areas. He had reason to believe that his Amendment commended itself to the whole body of moderate men on both sides of the House. The Amendment, he thought, would do something to remove the objection to this part of the Bill which transferred the licensing authority from the local justices to the quarter sessions

The quarter sessions were often a very large body which had necessarily no local knowledge of many parts of the county, and it was admitted that the justices were chosen very much at haphazard by the Lord Chancellor. He was told that members of quarter sessions had been whipped up often on both sides when the granting or refusal of a particular licence was coming up for decision. All these difficulties would be removed by his Amendment. He begged to move.

"In page 1, line 9, after the word 'shall' to insert the words 'in county areas.'"—(Mr. Ellis Griffith.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there insertea."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that there were many reasons for retaining the jurisdiction proposed in the Bill. They had framed the Bill so as to interfere as little as possible with the existing procedure. Every alteration was solely due to the necessity of having a larger compensation area. In cases where, for non-requirement or for other reasons, the brewster sessions came to the conclusion that a licence ought to be taken away, they were, under the Bill, to make an order referring the question to the quarter sessions with their report; whereas, under the old system the licence-holder had a direct appeal to quarter sessions. That was the only difference. The reason why the matter had not been allowed to remain exactly as it was, was that the area of compensation furnished by the ordinary licensing district of brewster sessions would be too small. That being so, was it not better to keep the quarter sessions and the form of procedure as nearly as possible as it was, than to set up a new tribunal which would have jurisdiction only in cases where compensation was concerned. In other words, they would have in every county, the quarter sessions seized of one part of this appellant jurisdiction, and the standing committee seized of another part of it. There was another question raised by this proposal, namely, the question of admitting a representative element in relation to the administration of the compensation fund. If the fund were a public fund subscribed out of the rates, or was in any way a county charge, it might be argued that there ought to be representation; but, of course, this fund was no such thing. It was a charge on one particular trade to enable them to insure against their licences being refused. He had always understood that the objection to this particular clause was that it interfered with the justices; but justices would be interfered with more by setting up a standing joint committee than by retaining quarter sessions. The Amendment, as far as he understood it, would also change what was proposed as regarded county boroughs, because it would take away from the whole body of the justices there the right to administer the fund in their own districts. That would be a great pity. In giving that power to justices in county boroughs he thought the Government were setting up the proper tribunal for administering this fund; and the reason why county boroughs were treated in this way was because they provided a sufficient compensation area. He was, therefore, unable to accept the Amendment.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) said the object of the Amendment he now proposed to move was to secure that no change in the machinery with regard to licensing administration should take place except on the condition that quarter sessions decided to levy the annual charge referred to in Sub-section 1, Clause 3, of the Bill. The root principle of this Bill was to attempt to reduce licences throughout the country, but that, in the view of the Government, could not be adequately or justly done without payment of compensation. The Government had made it clear that there would have been no need for any change in regard to licensing jurisdiction had it not been necessary to have a compensation fund of this character for the benefit of those who lost their licences on the sole ground of non-requirement. The Government had more than once asserted that it was not their desire to interfere in any way with the jurisdiction of the local licensing justices, but that if it was absolutely necessary to set up a compensation fund then it was necessary for quarter sessions to decide the question of non-renewals on the ground of non-necessity. That being so, what possible ground could there be for any interference with the present powers of jurisdiction of the local justices unless quarter sessions decided to set up a compensation fund? It was admitted that there was an inconvenience with regard to the double jurisdiction and there were undoubtedly serious disadvantages connected with it. He urged this Amendment on the practical ground that above all things it was desirable that every kind of stimulus should be provided for uniformity of action throughout the country in regard to the setting up of this fund. It was perfectly plain that unless every quarter sessions decided to levy the fund the fund would be hopelessly inadequate to bring about any reduction of licences throughout the country. On these grounds he begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 9, after the word 'shall,' to insert the words 'in the event of quarter sessions deciding to impose in respect of all on-licences within their area the charges referred to in Section 3, Sub-section (1), of the Act.'"—(Mr. Herbert Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Sir EDWARD CARSON said with regard to this Amendment he had nothing to add to what he had already said on a previous Amendment of a similar character. He asked what reason was there to suppose that quarter sessions would refuse to carry out their duty when this Bill was passed, any more than they refused to carry it out now. The whole argument in favour of this Amendment appeared to be that they were to assume that quarter sessions, when this Bill was passed, would refuse to administer the law. Did not the hon. Member who moved the Amendment see that if quarter sessions did not set up a compensation fund what it involved? Quarter sessions would at some time have to say, "We will not do our duty in the renewal of licences." They could not segregate the two cases. Directly quarter sessions refused to set up a compensation fund they abrogated all their functions under the Bill. If the Amendment were passed it would be necessary to go further and abolish quarter sessions altogether, because they might decide to set up the fund, but charge the minimum instead of the maximum rates, and thus defeat the purpose of the fund. It they were wicked enough to do the one thing they were bad enough to do the other. There was really no ground for treating quarter sessions in this way, they had always transacted their business properly, and there was no reason to suppose that they would adopt a different course in the future.

Mr. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe) pointed out that, inasmuch as the municipal authorities were losing their rights, there would be no reduction of licences whatever if the quarter sessions refused to act. It was only reasonable that this provision should be made compulsory. The local justices were most in touch with local opinion, but there was nothing in the Bill to give effect to the recommendation of both Reports of the Royal Commission that local opinion should be consulted. The Commission recommended that the licensing authority should be a combination of the justices and elected persons from the town council, but there was no provision of that kind in the Bill. As the powers of the borough justices were to be taken away, the county justices ought to be compelled to do something on the recommendation of the local magistrates. His experience as a borough magistrate had not been such as to satisfy him that the county justices would take the necessary steps without pressure. He hoped, therefore, the Government would not refuse the concession asked for by this Amendment.

Mr. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.) said the conditions under which the discussion was being carried on did not admit of anything like free or adequate debate, but the matter raised by the present Amendment was of so much urgency, and the grounds on which the hon. Member had rested his case were so strong, that he thought the Government might give it a little more consideration. The proposal of the Amendment was that the jurisdiction at present possessed by the licensing justices should be retained by them unless quarter sessions, to which that jurisdiction was by this Bill to be transferred, resolved to set up this fund. He entirely demurred to the suggestion of the Solicitor-General that the quarter sessions would be guilty of any neglect of duty if they refused to raise the fund. In some counties it was in the highest degree probable that quarter sessions would not think it worth while to do so. In consequence of the smallness of the area involved the fund would be wholly inadequate to effect any substantial reduction of licences, and quarter sessions might very reasonably say that they would have nothing whatever to do with the matter. What would be the position then? The power of the licensing justices would have been taken away, and in its place a nugatory power given to quarter sessions; therefore in those counties the whole thing would be hung up, and there would be no authority in a position to exercise a jurisdiction which everybody admitted to be necessary. A more reasonable Amendment had not, in his opinion, been proposed in the whole course of the discussion.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be all very well if the local authorities had an absolute power to refuse licences, but they had no such power, as the last word already lay with quarter sessions. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman should have said that quarter sessions would be able to ignore the Bill. But if any quarter sessions were in that frame of mind, if this Amendment were carried how many licences were they likely to do away with on the appeal of the local justices? The same matters would be operative with them, and would render the provision nugatory.

Mr. DISRAELI (Cheshire, Altrincham) did not believe the quarter sessions of a single English county would refuse to take this matter up and act. Quarter sessions throughout the country had long desired to do something in the way of the reduction of licences, but they had not possessed the power. They were now to have the power, and it was not likely that any body of English gentlemen would refuse to exercise it.

MR. J. H. LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said the object of his Amendment was to give quarter sessions the option of remaining outside the scope of the Act altogether, and that was a totally different question to the one which had just been decided. His proposal would enable quarter sessions, in cases where they considered it desirable, to wait in order that they might see how the Act operated in other counties. They all knew that at the commencement of an Act of this kind administrative mistakes were constantly made, and the various authorities gained by each other's experience. He thought it was desirable that there should be a certain amount of local option. Some countries were much more highly licensed than others, and some had not such a large proportion of licences. What they were doing by this Bill was to absolutely close every possible door by which any sort of different administration could be carried out as an experiment in different districts in the future. Surely the experience of their Colonies, and of Norway, Sweden, and the United States, supplied them with a sufficient number of precedents to work upon. They were by this measure making any sort of licensing reforms impossible except upon the lines suggested by this Bill. He particularly asked that in the Welsh counties they should have in the future some chance of settling this question in their own way, and on their own lines. If Courts of quarter sessions in Wales, knowing the feelings of the Welsh people, should decide that it would be better to defer putting the Act into operation in order to see whether some better method could be found, which would promote temperance reform, he suggested that some liberty should be given to those Courts to adopt that course. The fact that there was no time limit in the Bill made an Amendment of this kind all the more necessary. Had there been a time limit they might have looked forward to some change of a beneficial character not altogether upon the lines of this Bill. He urged that the Government should give some measure of local option to the counties in order that some of the counties might keep outside the sphere of this Bill, and thus give Parliament an opportunity of perhaps settling the question in a different way in the future. For the reasons he had given he hoped the Government would see their way to accept the Amendment he had proposed.

"In page 1, line 9, after the word 'shall,' to insert the words, 'when quarter sessions so determine.'"—(Mr. J. H. Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said the object of the hon. Member's Amendment was to wait to see how the Bill operated in neighbouring counties; and he also desired that there should be a general local option in regard to the Act altogether. The Government thought the Bill was for the general benefit of the public and he saw no reason why the principle laid down should not apply all round. On these grounds he could not agree to the Amendment.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) said that after his experience on the Licensing Bench he was quite certain that justices would object to the alteration proposed in the Bill. It would be entirely against the public interest and there would be considerable feeling on the part of many licensing justices against putting the Bill in operation. They should have the option as the Amendment proposed to remain on their present footing and not adopt the Bill. The Home Secretary had stated that the Bill was one to reduce licences and that that was a good thing. He admitted that was a good thing, but it certainly was not a more important section of licensing reform than some others. There were half-a-dozen objects of even greater importance than the mere reduction of licences, and, keen as he was himself for restricting the excessive use of liquor, he was certain that this was not a Bill which should be put in operation by a Bench that had the power of effecting reforms in the liquor traffic in other ways. This was a vicious Bill and the local justices should have the power of not adopting it.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE (Bristol, E.) said it was only fair that the opinion of the local justices should receive some attention in regard to a Bill of this sort, which they had to administer. The spirit of local option which the Amendment proposed to introduce into the Bill already obtained in regard to the Education Act. It was a spirit which had been found on the whole to make Acts of Parliament work fairly. Whether this Bill was good or bad was outside the question now before the Committee. The magistrate who disapproved of the measure would always be loth to administer it. Yet as a matter of fact Licensing Benches would have, after all, to put the Act into operation. That being so, some power of discrimination in this matter should be left to the licensing justices. Quarter sessions were supposed to know the conditions of a whole county over which they administered justice, and on the whole it was a fair contention that, knowing those conditions, they would be in a better position than the House to apply the Bill. For this reason the elasticity provided for by the Amendment should be put into the Bill.

MR. J. H. LEWIS regretted that the Government could not see their way to make a concession on this point, and all the more so because some of the counties were so extremely large that quarter sessions might reasonably consider that they could not take over the powers of the local justices which were given to them by this Bill, and that they would prefer to see how the experiment worked in other parts of the country. In his own county it was variously estimated that it would take between eighty and 100 years to get the number of licences down to the same level as in the adjoining county of Merioneth. In the course of the debate it had been mentioned that the average cost of a licence would be £800. He believed that was the figure given officially in a pamphlet written on behalf of the trade. Quarter sessions might reasonably say: "We will see whether some better means of reducing licences cannot be got than this, and in the meantime we will collect experience from all parts of the country." If the right hon. Gentleman would not accept the Amendment he would be bound to press it to a division.

MR. JOHNSON (Gateshead) said he believed it was desirable that local justices should have the option, in connection with this Bill, of waiting to get some experience before adopting it. He regretted that the Government had not accepted the Amendment. It appeared to him that the Government were not only determined to make no concessions whatever, but that this Bill was to be put through by sheer force, and that the smallest attempts on the Opposition side of the House to minimise its drastic effects were to be absolutely ignored. He hoped that some concessions which would be likely to make the Bill workable would be granted. Surely the local justices were the best able to judge whether the Bill should be put in operation or not. But it appeared to him no discretion was to be given, even to the Courts of quarter sessions, and that they must adopt and carry out the Bill at all hazards.

MR. WHITLEY said his hon. friend was quite correct in appealing to the analogy of the Education Bill. The great mistake which was made in connection with the Education Bill, and which was having a disastrous effect all over the country at the present moment, was that the areas were too big for any single body to deal with. The Government had already acknowledged their mistake in that respect by adopting smaller areas under the Scotch Education Bill. In the Bill now before the Committee they proposed to have a body which would rest on the advice of officials. The Amendment proposed that power should be left to quarter sessions to divide their administrative areas into districts, and to delegate their duties in that way.

MR. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton) said that, after all, they wanted to give local authorities some option as to what they should do, as they knew what they were fitted for. A protest was made in Devonshire against being saddled with the duties of the Education Act, and now the cost of administration had gone up enormously without any increased efficiency. Who was to pay for the increased staff consequent on the Licensing Bill? He was certain the ratepayers in his county would strongly object. The Government thought the county was a sort of divine area. A county could do no wrong, but anything less than a county area was hopeless. If a county was fitted to carry out the duties surely it was fitted to know whether it should carry them out or not. These were entirely novel proposals and he would ask the Government to give some elasticity to county bodies as to what they should put in force. Owing to the drastic proposals of the Government he did not know what this Bill really proposed to do. Supposing the county justices did not put the Bill in force, were there any compulsory powers provided to compel them to put it in force? He might be told that that question would arise later on, but it might be wiped out by closure by compartments. The Amendment of his hon. friend was perfectly conciliatory, and if the Government were not proof against accepting any suggestion for the improvements of the Bill, which he was afraid they were, he hoped they would give a favourable ear to his hon. friend's proposal. If not, it would only be another case of the extravagant inefficiency caused by this scheme of the Government, which meant something like centralisation gone mad. If they were met with a blank refusal by the Government they could, of course, only support their opinion in the Division Lobby.

Question put.

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.) said that the object of his Amendment was to secure that there should be some provision for a systematic report and inquiry by the justices in each licensing district as regarded public-houses for the guidance of quarter sessions. The consequential part of the Amendment appeared on page twenty-eight of the Amendment Paper. He considered that under the scheme of the Bill it was necessary to transfer those powers from the licensing justices to the quarter sessions; but they should be careful, in doing that, not to unnecessarily weaken the power of the licensing justices. There was no new duty imposed under this Bill on the licensing justices to take any survey of the public-houses in their district and to decide which of them ought to be shut up and which ought to be continued. The great object of this Bill, as they were constantly informed by the Government, was to make a large reduction in the number of public-houses; and it was because of that consideration that many of them voted for the Second Reading. But, unless there was some further provision, that would not be done in all cases. In saying that he did not wish to cast any slur on quarter sessions, of the honour of which the Solicitor-General was so justly jealous. He had no doubt they would do their duty; but that duty would be to deal from time to time with the individual cases referred to them. Quarter sessions would have no initiative; and he contended that the only way in which quarter sessions could get a comprehensive view of the conditions, and exercise any intelligent discrimination as to what public-houses should be shut, was to provide within the four corners of the Bill for a proper and systematic inquiry by the justices in every licensing district, who were the people best acquainted with the facts. It was most important that quarter sessions before they proceeded to administer the compensation fund should have a comprehensive report such as he proposed. Otherwise, there would be certain to be great irregularity, which would be undesirable. There ought to be a proper and systematic report. He had an Amendment further on to provide that the justices of every licensing district should, at their general licensing sessions, or an adjournment thereof, to be held in the year 1905, and in every third subsequent year, inquire into the needs of their district and the number and character of the licensed houses therein, and should make a report to quarter sessions stating the particular on-licences (if any) which in their opinion ought not to be renewed, and any circumstances affecting such licences or the holder thereof which might be material to the renewal or to the value of such licences. If that could be secured, then, and only then, would quarter sessions be able to take a comprehensive view of their duties and decide what was best in the interests of temperance. He did not insist on the exact words of the Amendment; but he hoped the Government would insert an Amendment to carry out his object.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 9, after the word 'shall' to insert the words 'subject to the provisions of this section for inquiry and report by licensing justices.'"—(Mr. Henry Hobhouse.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that any Amendment moved by his right hon. friend would naturally receive the fullest consideration from the Government. He was not sure, however, that he quite understood the Amendment except in a general way. He understood it to mean that quarter sessions should every three years take a full survey of the whole situation. What was to follow? If they had to wait until this survey was made every three years in order to see what action should be taken, this would mean a revolution in the present annual system. At present there was annual revision, which, he submitted, was a much better system, for it enabled the licensing authorities to carry out the wishes of the justices in each district as far as they were agreed. He could not see, therefore, what was to be gained by changing the system. The Amendment gave quarter sessions powers of initiation which they did not now possess, and he thought that the annual revision was preferable. The point he did not understand was what action would be taken in the interval between the triennial periods.

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE said that there was nothing in his Amendment to prevent a report in any year.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said it would be open to the justices to take a survey at any period, and report to quarter sessions. He did not really think anything would be gained by the Amendment. They did not intend to interfere with the licensing justices further than was necessitated by the principles of compensation. It would be impossible, without changing the whole licensing law, to take away the annual revision; and there would be no difficulty in the licensing justices surveying their districts and reporting to quarter sessions. He had not the least objection to confer with the right hon. Gentleman. This was a matter which did not go to the principle of the Bill and he would have pleasure in meeting his hon. friend, if he could, by drafting an Amendment which would carry out the object he desired. He might say that there was a similar Amendment further down on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon, which he was prepared to accept, which had in view that the progress of quarter sessions should be steadily kept under review. That seemed to him to be an important Amendment, keeping strictly in view what was being done, and an Amendment which he was prepared to accept. So far as the wording of this Amendment was concerned, while he did not say an Amendment of this character ought not to be accepted, it gave greater power of control to quarter sessions, and that being so he could not accept it.

MR. CRIPPS said, though they were grateful to the Solicitor-General for what he had said, that he could not help thinking the hon. and learned Gentleman had not entirely apprehended what this Amendment sought to do. The underlying idea was to obtain a triennial or annual review, of the licences of each district. He agreed that it should be an annual review but that was a detail which did not go to the basis of the Amendment. In order that the county authority should do its best and make the best of the compensation fund, it would be necessary to work on what might be called a county scheme. They had to see what had to be done in the county area in order to see how the fund could be worked to the best advantage, and how could a county scheme be arrived at without making the county authority the initiating authority for this reform? What his right hon. friend proposed by his Amendment was not to interfere with the main principle but to so modify it as to obtain the knowledge of the local authority, so as to enable the county authority to use the compensation fund to the best advantage, and he proposed to do so by asking the local Bench of each district to send are port to the county authority of the needs of the district. If that were done the county authority would be able to get out a good county scheme because they would have the local knowledge which every one desired they should have. Instead of having to rely on a chance objection made by an individual they would be able to ask each particular bench of magistrates to draw out the scheme which they thought best for administering the Bill in their own particular district. When the local justices had done that the county authority could act on the full information coming from these local authorities and the fund would be allocated to its true purpose. He asked the Solicitor-General, therefore, to say that, if a scheme could be evolved which would at once preserve the power of the licensing magistrates of the district and at the same time ensure that the quarter sessions had proper information to deal with the fund in the best possible manner under a county scheme, an Amendment should be introduced to bring together those two desirable objects. Every one interested in this licensing question would agree that this would be a great administrative reform and that it would enable this Bill to be carried out in a broad and at the same time a most economical manner. On these grounds he supported the Amendment.

*Mr. DUKE (Plymouth) said he hoped the Solicitor-General would introduce some words into the Bill to give effect to the principle of the Amendment of his right hon. friend. The Bill as it stood was incomplete without the acceptance of some such Amendment as that. The Solicitor-General had assumed that there was at the licensing sessions at the present time a review of licences with a view of ascertaining where licences were redundant.

Sir EDWARD CARSON: I say they have the power.

*Mr. DUKE said he had no doubt of that, but what he desired was that they should not only have the power, but that they should also be reminded of their duty. If words were not put in to impress upon the justices the necessity of considering whether there were, or were not, redundant licences in their district, this Bill would fail in its object. All that was desired by the hon. Member for East Somersetshire was that some words should be introduced which would make it the duty of the licensing justices, either annually or at some other period of time, to consider whether there were in the district redundant licences and what ought to be done with those licences The concession which the Government had made with regard to the imposition upon quarter sessions of the duty of reporting to the Home Secretary was the strongest possible argument in favour of putting upon the licensing justices the duty of reporting to the quarter sessions.

*Mr. TALBOT (Oxford University) said he desired to support the Amendment, but from a different point of view from that of the mover of it. What he hoped would result from this discussion was that that stimulus would be applied to the local justices which, notwithstanding what had been said as to their extreme energy, was requisite looking to the infirmities of human nature. As the general desire was to remove all redundant licences it must be made not only permissible for the local justices to remove them, but a stimulus must be applied to ensure that they should do so. It was for the reason that he desired to see the stimulus applied that he supported the Amendment.

Mr. PEEL (Manchester, S.) asked whether, in view of the strong feeling on the Government side of the House that something in the direction of the Amendment should be carried out, the Solicitor-General would undertake to introduce a clause. If the matter were postponed to the Report stage, there might, in consequence of the arrangement of new clauses, be some difficulty.

Sir EDWARD CARSON was not sure that he yet understood the object of the Amendment. It appeared to be an attempt to enlarge the power of quarter sessions. Under the Bill the licensing justices were the persons to select the houses to be sent up to quarter sessions. They were bound to do that each year.

Mr. DUKE pointed out that there was no obligation in the Bill.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that neither was there any obligation upon the licensing justices now. This was a new complaint. Hitherto the point he had had to meet was that the Government were taking away powers of the licensing justices, but the case here was different. If the selection was left to the licensing justices, how, by sending up a report to quarter sessions, could they effect anything unless the initiation was left to quarter sessions? He did not think the Amendment was necessary, but if the object was to make it clear that it was for brewster sessions to select the cases and for quarter sessions to say whether they agreed or disagreed, he was quite willing to try to meet that view. Under the Bill quarter sessions would have a report from, and a consultation with, the licensing justices, and he failed to see what further assistance in coming to a conclusion would be given by the Amendment. There was also the question of expense. If each year the licensing justices were to send up a report, not merely of the houses which they suggested should be taken away in that year, but of all redundant houses, leaving it to quarter sessions to make a selection, not only would that be a greater infringement upon the rights of the licensing justices than the Bill now made, but it would be necessary for every person interested in each one of those houses to appear annually before quarter sessions, although probably less than one-tenth of the houses would be dealt with in any particular year. That would be almost a prohibitive matter from the point of view of expense. If it was thought to be any advantage that the local magistrates should make the same annual report to the Home Office, and that that Department should distribute it to quarter sessions, he was willing to include that in the Amendment he had promised.

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE said he was afraid that would not meet the case. His object was that quarter sessions should have from each district not only a report as to the particular houses which were proper subjects for immediate action, but full information as to the other houses which it would be advisable to get rid of in the future, so that they should not dissipate all their money at once. He was sure that was an object which the Government could secure if they liked. This subject would not be discussed on Report owing to the very stringent rules which had been laid down, and he was very much afraid that a mere conference would not produce that effect which would cause the suggestion to be accepted.

* MR. TALBOT said that after hearing what the Solicitor-General had said he was thoroughly satisfied. He was of opinion that these powers which the justices had possessed had not always been operative forces in the country, and he thought it would require a considerable amount of pressure on the local justices to make sure that they would put this provision into operation. The Solicitor-General had promised to provide that it should be the duty of the licensing justices to report to the Home Office what they had done under the Act, and probably that would give that stimulus to putting the Act into operation which he desired.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR said he did not know whether his right hon. and learned friend appreciated the fact that this Bill gave no stimulus whatever to the licensing justices to take a survey of the needs of the district every year. Clause 2 provided that the licensing justices were to report on the question of the renewal of any particular on-licences. A concrete illustration of what had happened in Liverpool was valuable as a forecast of what was likely to happen under this Bill. In Liverpool they took a number of areas where the property had been demolished, and year by year they considered the redundancy of licences in those areas. After extinguishing a number of licences in any particular area they did not trouble that district again for some time, and possibly would not touch any more licences in that district for many years. That was a illustration of how this Bill ought to work if any good was really going to be done. His hon. friend had stated that in the past some benches of magistrates had been too active while others had not been active enough. What he desired was to give the necessary stimulus to the licensing justices to bring their efforts up to the requirements of temperance reform by directing them to take a survey of the whole needs of the area.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) said he did not propose to move the Amendment standing in his name. He thought it was desirable to support the Amendment to be proposed by the hon. Member for Huddersfield.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE said he wished to move in line 9 of Clause 1, after "in," to insert "a committee, one-half of whom in every case shall be elected by the justices of the licensing district from their own number, and one-half by the county council from their own number." He said that this Amendment raised the question of the introduction of some representative element in the constitution of the authority which would have to deal with licences. He was fortified in submitting the Amendment by the fact that the principle received the support of both the Majority and Minority Reports of the Royal Commission. He also claimed that the Scottish Act of last year contained precisely the same suggestion he was making. What was good for Scotland ought to be good for England. Apart from that, the introduction of the representative principle was thoroughly justified by the fact that the ratepayers had to pay for the consequences of intemperance in the shape of increased police rates and poor rates and all the consequences that flowed from the excessive use of intoxicating drinks. The ordinary principle of self-government, namely, that what the ratepayers had to pay for they ought to have some right to control, should be observed in this matter. As long ago as 1835 the House of Commons sanctioned that principle, when the Municipal Reform Act of that year was under discussion, by a large majority. The House of Lords rejected the proposal, but the view of the House of Commons was that the whole question of licences should be placed in the hands of municipal corporations. Further, the Conservative Government, when the Local Government Act was being considered in the year 1888, proposed to give a committee of the county council power to deal with licences, so that he had these precedents in support of his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 9, to leave out from the word 'in,' to the word 'but,' in line 10, and insert the words 'a committee, one-half of whom in every case shall be elected by the justices of the licensing district from their own number, and one-half by the county council from their own number.'"—(Sir James Woodhouse.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'quarter sessions' stand part of the clause."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. WALTER LONG, Bristol, S.) said that the Government were unable to accept the Amendment. The hon. Member had referred to what took place in 1888, when the Conservative Government proposed to make a committee of the county council the authority to administer licences; but the authority of 1888 was based on different principles from those which they were now proposing; although he admitted now proposing; although he admitted that if the proposal of the Government of 1888 had been accepted a great many of the existing difficulties would not have arisen. The Amendment was wholly at variance with the principle followed in drafting the Bill, which had been to make as little change as possible in the existing system and to leave the decision to a judicial body. There were differences of administration in counties and boroughs, but as closely as possible the Bill kept to the existing system. The Amendment would mean a radical change in the existing system, and such was not intended. Really the changes made by the Bill in the licensing system would be small; if the justices refused a renewal of a licence to an applicant, the ultimate decision would rest with the quarter sessions as a judicial body.

Sir JAMES WOODHOUSE: That would not apply to county boroughs.

Mr. WALTER LONG: There were points of difference in administration between the county boroughs and the county councils. The Government had endeavoured to keep as nearly as possible to the existing system, and to leave to the magistrates the decision of the matters in question. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman would involve a complete change in the existing system, because instead of these cases being referred to quarter sessions they would be referred to a committee, half of whom would be elected by the licensing justices and half by the county council. They proposed to give to the body in which the power now rested the right to say what licence should not be renewed and the exercise of that right accompanied by compensation to be provided by the trade itself. The Amendment would be a radical departure from the proposals in the Bill; and he, therefore, hoped the Committee would not accept it.

Tellers for the Noes—Mr. Channing and Mr. Charles Allen

*Mr. DUKE said he had been astonished, not to say dismayed, to hear the President of the Local Government Board assume as a fact that the quarter sessions in discharging the duties to be discharged under this Bill would act as a judicial body. Everyone conversant with the duties of quarter sessions would know that they had two separate and distinct sets of duties, one of them administrative and the other judicial. There was no difficulty in distinguishing between the administrative duties which had devolved on justices by the practice of centuries and the operation of Acts of Parliament and their judicial duties which were of quite a different character. It was essential that Parliament should decide whether the duties devolving on quarter sessions through this Bill, which was an administrative measure, should be performed by quarter sessions as a judicial or an administrative body. He submitted that these administrative duties should be performed by quarter sessions as an administrative body.

And, it being half-past Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this evening.

EVENING SITTING.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1:—

*Mr. DUKE, continuing his speech, contended that if the Bill were examined it would be seen that it was impossible that it could have ever been intended that it was to be administered on judicial principles; there was no contest, and the whole matter was one of administration. There could be no judicial decisions, no parties and no dispute which required a tribunal or procedure to deal with them on judicial lines. He asked the Government to consider whether there were not some means by which they could define the powers which the justices were to exercise. If some were to be judicial let them be selected and declared to be powers to be administered judicially. But having regard to the fact that the major part of these powers were purely administrative powers, he asked the Government to make the matter clear in the Act. If they did not make it clear that the whole of the powers were administrative and were to be exercised with the freedom with which administrative powers were exercised by administrative bodies in this country, at any rate let them declare what the judicial powers were and leave the local authority free to administer the administrative powers. He begged to move.

"In page 1, line 9, after the word 'sessions,' to insert the words 'acting as an administrative body.'"—(Mr. Duke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Sir EDWARD CARSON said so far as he could see this discussion was purely of an academic nature. There was no doubt that many of the duties to be performed were purely of an administrative character. It could be gathered from the Bill, without setting out the fact, that quarter sessions was acting as an administrative body. His hon. and learned friend was correct in saying that many of the duties of quarter sessions under this Bill would be administrative. Licensing and setting up the compensation fund were purely matters of administration, but there were other duties cast on quarter sessions by this Bill which could not be described as other than judicial. In all cases of appeal from the licensing justices and in all matters specified in the first sub-section they would act judicially. A licence-holder who was refused a renewal might appeal to quarter sessions, and there again they would have to act in a judicial capacity. The licensing authorities might report that there were too many licensed houses in the district, and in that case a licence-holder whose licence was to be extinguished had a right to appeal to quarter sessions and say, "It is quite true that you say my licence ought to be taken away but I dispute that." Such a thing as that would constitute the very case which his hon. and learned friend said would necessitate a judicial decision, inasmuch as there would be a dispute between the parties. Quarter sessions were also entitled to hear other parties interested, which would include the justices who made the order. To draw a distinction between one set of cases in which they would be acting in a judicial capacity and another set of cases equally important, as leading to the same result, and to lay it down that in the latter they must act in a purely administrative character, would be a monstrous thing to do.

*Mr. DUKE asked the Solicitor-General would the quarter sessions administer the principles of law or doctrines of equity?

Sir EDWARD CARSON said they would administer both. The insertion of the words "acting as an administrative body" would leave it open to quarter sessions to say in regard to particular matters that although they had litigants and advocates before them and had to hear evidence, they, nevertheless, were not acting in a judicial capacity. The important thing was to know what duties were imposed, their nature, and how they were to be carried out. There would be no difficulty in determining, where necessary, when quarter sessions were acting judicially and when administratively.

Sir ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) noted the statements of the Solicitor-General that in accordance with the Act of 1902 the justices would still be heard upon these applications, and that in dealing with the personal and public rights involved there would be an opportunity for legal assistance, if necessary, in determining what were essentially judicial questions. He could not, however, follow the right hon. and learned Gentleman in his distinction between the administrative and judicial functions of quarter sessions. The appointment of the compensation fund provided not by the State or the public, but by the whole body of licence-holders themselves, the want of which had been one great obstacle to temperance reform, and the cessation of which, under a time limit, would, he felt as a magistrate, be a new and even greater impediment to such reform, which he heartily favoured, but for which personally he relied more upon education than upon legislation—was administrative; but the private question whether a licensee should or should not have his licence renewed, and the important public question whether the licence should or should not be renewed in the public interest owing to an excess of licensed houses in the district, was as clearly a matter of justice and to be judicially determined by the magistrates, who had always been bound, in law, not to act merely arbitrarily, but to exercise a real judicial discretion. The insertion of the words now proposed would be restrictive of the operation of the Bill. Two great questions would have to be dealt with judicially—first: Whether a licensee ought to be deprived of his licence on public grounds; and, secondly: Whether a particular house was required or not. In the former a private, and in the latter a public interest was concerned. The calculation of the compensation might be an administrative act, but it was merely a corollary of what quarter sessions must have previously determined judicially, viz., whether or not a licence should be renewed. The determination on the report of the local justices would frequently involve very important judicial considerations. As to the Bill derogating from the power of the local justices, he believed that a formal reasoned report, which would always be before quarter sessions, would have more influence and be more difficult to displace, because the onus of displacing it would be cast upon the virtual appellant. There ought to be in the future as there had been in the past a judicial determination of questions which were still really to be the subject of an automatic appeal. He hoped, therefore, the Bill would not be restricted by the insertion of the Amendment, which would restrict the duty owed towards both the publican and the public, each of whom were entitled to justice, and he noted from the speech of the Solicitor-General that the practice before the magistrates at brewster sessions would be maintained intact, and also that the parties interested and the local justices would still be entitled to legal assistance on such judicial points at quarter sessions, while in the county boroughs the abolition of any appeal to the quarter sessions for the county was an unquestionable concession to a long-standing grievance. Compensation, the fund for which might well have been made more adequate, and in which alone, and not in the licence, any vested interest was created, was the corollary of the refusal to renew, was thus administrative. but there was a previous question to be determined, renewal or non-renewal, and this was a judicial one from both points of view. But, it was contended, that the new practice would derogate from the powers and influence of the local justices. As to this, and as both a county and a borough magistrate, and a former legal practitioner in licensing cases on each side as to renewal or non-renewal and as to new licences, he respectfully but strongly differed. For, under the existing practice, the right of appeal from brewster to quarter sessions against non-renewal on the ground of excession of number of houses was absolute and practically always exercised. And the change proposed to be made in the case of such non-renewals was really an automatic appeal. With this difference, that the local justices, who, it had been legally decided, should not be represented on the appeal except under special circumstances, who were sometimes represented and sometimes not, and who, it was understood, would still retain any right to appear, and under the Act of 1902 would also be empowered to make a written and reasoned report to quarter sessions in every case of non-renewal on public grounds of excess of number of houses; and, whether the justices were represented or not, this report would always be read and largely referred to. Now, as a magistrate, he felt that such a report from a competent Court would receive more respect than any mere ex parte advocacy, inasmuch as it would be founded on local knowledge and experience, while it would be adjudicated upon by an independent judicial tribunal. It would, of course, be treated, as all such Court reports were by appeal tribunals, with respect, while it would have the effect, which advocacy on a rehearing never could have, of casting the onus of displacing it upon the party who impeached it, a legal consideration the importance of which any magistrate or practitioner would appreciate. And this was clearly not an administrative matter, but one which he himself and other magistrates, would always seek to determine as a judicial question and by the exercise of an impartial discretion, after hearing the justices' report, and that the parties, including the local magistrates, had to say upon it; and surely this was no reduction of such magistrates' powers, but, so far as it was more than an automatic equivalent of the existing absolute right of appeal to quarter sessions, rather an increase of power than otherwise. But all this was essentially judicial, not merely administrative, and such being the case he must oppose the Amendment of his hon. friend.

*Sir JAMES WOODHOUSE supported the Amendment, which he submitted clearly declared the law as laid down by the highest tribunals in the land—viz., that the determination of the question of the renewal of a licence, on the ground of non-requirement, was an administrative and not a judicial act. The only reason which had been avowed for vesting this duty in quarter sessions was that they were to dispense the compensation fund, but as an administrative and not as a judicial duty, so that no ground had been alleged for turning the tribunal of quarter sessions from an administrative into a judicial body in that sense. The report was to be sent from the licensing justices to the quarter sessions, not as a Court of Appeal, but as an authority who were to deal with it as an originating and determining body; and he submitted that there was a broad distinction between quarter sessions hearing an appeal, and determining a matter as an originating body with sole power to decide. The moment the question was considered in connection with a county borough the absurdity of the position became apparent. In county boroughs the whole body of justices, having no power to determine the matter themselves, would send it to a committee of their own members to decide finally, so that, according to the Solicitor-General, the whole body would be an administrative body, while the committee of the larger body would be a judicial body. Anybody who had had experience of the working of the licensing law would be compelled to agree with the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth.

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.) agreed that there were times when quarter sessions had to act in an administrative capacity, but he thought the case which had been put forward demonstrated that when it was a question of dealing with the report of a committee, consisting practically of a minority of the magistrates of a county borough, they were bound to act in a judicial capacity. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth had at any rate made out a case for a clear definition, although possibly the present was not the occasion upon which the Solicitor-General would prefer to give it. Quarter sessions had to determine the number of licences to be sacrificed, and they could not be said to be acting in a strictly judicial capacity until they had actually singled out the individual victims, and then every person interested ought to be heard.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH moved to leave out the words "instead of" and insert "sitting with." According to the Bill the justices of the licensing district would have the position of a committee against whom there would be an appeal to quarter sessions. It might happen that the licensing justices declared by a large majority against a renewal, and their decision might be reversed by quarter sessions by a bare majority, and his object in providing that licensing justices should sit with quarter sessions upon the hearing of the appeal, was that the authorities having local knowledge should also have a voice in determining the question. He trusted that the Solicitor-General would, at any rate, be able to accept the substance of his Amendment.

"In page 1, line 9, to leave out the words 'instead of,' and insert the words 'sitting with.'"—(Mr. Ellis Griffith.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said he could not accept the Amendment; it would be absolutely impossible that the justices of every licensing district should sit at quarter sessions. Licensing justices would, in fact, have great influence, for they would have the initiating power to bring about the withdrawal of a licence and quarter sessions would not. That a decision by quarter sessions might be given by a small majority was true, and the same thing happened in the High Court; he had recent experience of a decision being upset in the House of Lords by a majority of one. That had to be accepted and an exception could not be made in a case of this kind. The hon. and learned Member said that the licensing justices would have no voice in the matter; but he wished to point out that they would have a great voice because quarter sessions would have no initiative, and the licensing justices would have to select those licences which they thought ought not to be renewed. Therefore it was not quite accurate to say that they had no voice, and his hon. and learned friend would therefore see that the matter was not really so bad as he had made out.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Ellis Griffith and Mr. Edwards.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON moved to leave out the word "but" in line 10, and to insert the word "and" with the object of ensuring that there should be a sufficient reduction of licences under the Bill and also to ensure that the public, to some extent, would get value for the rights which, in the opinion of many, they were called upon to relinquish under the Bill. The Solicitor-General informed the Committee yesterday that some of the Amendments were being moved in a perfunctory manner without sufficient reasons being given in their support. He was afraid that he would now be open to the same charge, because the point raised by the Amendment was a very large one. The reproach did not come very well from those who had taken steps to secure that it would be impossible to reason on many of the greater issues raised by this Bill. If time permitted, he believed a strong case could be made out for the Amendment he now proposed. In introducing the Bill, the Home Secretary said its object was the reduction of licences. The right hon. Gentleman said that was a good thing. Well, if this reduction was so necessary, why was it not to be compulsory? The impression of the Prime Minister was that the justices had been consumed with a desire to reduce licences unnecessarily throughout the country. His own experience was very different. He believed that the desire for conferring licences was, in many instances, a great deal keener than the desire to restrict them. The licensing authorities which had been least inclined to reduce licences had been quarter sessions. They might take as an example a division of the county to which he belonged. In the Island of Lewis the local justices had over and over again refused to renew licences, and the licences had always been restored by quarter sessions. He saw little security under this Bill of any large, general, or sufficient reduction of licences. Indeed, it offered obstacles to the reduction of licences, because many licences, which had no value at present, would be given a value, and the valuation scheme, by which it was proposed to make the value of licences as they stood at the passing of the Bill the basis of compensation, was, in his opinion, largely delusive. It would be found that they were raising, under this Bill, many financial obstacles to the reduction of licences. To make the reduction effective, he submitted that it should be compulsory. He did not regard the reduction of licences as the most essential branch of temperance reform. He looked upon the provision of counter attractions, which were wholly unprovided for in this Bill, and the maintenance of the control of the justices, as far more important than the mere reduction of licences, which to a large extent would be made more difficult under this Bill than it was now. There could be no difficulty in providing compulsory power under the Bill, because the hon. Baronet the Member for North-west Manchester, Lord Peel, and others suggested a scheme by which compulsion could be effected, and they recorded in the Minority Report that a great reduction of licences was a matter of the first importance, and that the redistribution of licensed houses should be safeguarded by a statutory maximum of say one on-licensed house to every 750 persons in a town population, and every 400 in a country population. Their view was that in seven years the number of on-licences should be reduced to that figure in England, and within five years in Scotland. The hon. Baronet knew that the distribution of licences in the North was much more approximate to this standard than it was in England. He wished the hon. Baronet had himself raised this point, and all the more because, although they had heard a great deal as to the support moderate men would be able to give to temperance reform, the course of this debate had shown how utterly ineffective their support had been in the discussions on the Bill. The object of the hon. Baronet was that at the end of seven years in England and five years in Scotland, the field should be left clear for legislative experiments by Parliament in the way of providing for the elimination of the element of profit in the liquor traffic, or any other method by which the liquor traffic could be more effectively controlled than at present. Besides that there should be absolute freedom for local communities to control the liquor traffic, either through local option or any other effective system of administration. Judging from his experience of the working of the present system he believed this Bill would form an effective check to the development of temperance reform schemes in the direction he had indicated. He believed that a compulsory reduction of licences would in some degree be a mitigation of the evils which would follow the passing of the Bill, and that it would be some security for leaving the way open for future experiments. It would also secure that the public would not have to pay a great deal more than they ought to. What the public were losing through this Bill was the rights in the monopoly which had been created by the public. That constituted to his mind confiscation of public property. He moved his Amendment, and would leave it to the judgment of the House.

Question proposed, "That the word 'but' stand part of the clause.'"

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that the Amendment put from the Chair had no relation to the important question raised by the hon. Member opposite. The hon. Member had spoken on many points of great public importance, and had said that under this Bill the public were losing the benefit of a monopoly which belonged to them. If that were so, all he could say was that the public had been a very long time in trying to regain that monopoly. In his view the public would have a very much better chance of securing that monopoly on a proper basis when this Bill was passed, because it was practically admitted that during the last fifty or sixty years no progress had been made in the reduction of public-houses at all. The object of the Amendment was to lay down a fixed proportion of public-houses to population in every district in the country, and to do so in general terms. That was impossible, because the requirements of every district were absolutely different from those of other districts, and the hon. Member had the Report of the Commission against him. It appeared that the hon. Member also wished, in laying down his arbitrary statutory maximum or minimum, to provide an unlimited amount of compensation. His principle might be all very well if they were dealing with public funds, but was quite out of place when they were calling on the trade itself to supply the money for the insurance. He entirely disputed the suggestion that licences which had no value now would acquire a value by the passage of this Bill. They had put the clearest possible language into the Bill to prevent that.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield) said that according to a trade paper no one doubted that those who would have to pay this tax were the consumers of liquor.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said that the complaint of the hon. Member was that in this Bill no provision was made for what he spoke of as counter attractions to the public-house, and he seemed to regard that as of more importance than the reduction of licences. He himself had always held that view, and had preached it in vain to hon. Gentlemen opposite. When the hon. Member for Wolverhampton introduced his Parish Councils Bill he moved an Amendment that parish councils should have the power to provide parish rooms which would be a counter attraction to the public-houses, but that Amendment was refused. The object of the Amendment, as he gathered, was to secure a compulsory reduction in the number of licences. He himself had put on the Paper an Amendment with the object of making it the duty of magistrates to give attention to the number of public-houses in proportion to the requirements of the population. He hoped that the Government would give their attention to this matter, and would see whether they could not insert in the Bill some provision in the direction suggested in his Amendment.

MR. WHITTAKER said that if they were to pass a compensation scheme they should secure some substantial reduction of licences. But under the Bill there was no guarantee that there would be any reduction anywhere. It would be optional for the local justices to make a recommendation, optional for quarter sessions to accept the recommendation, and optional for quarter sessions to raise a fund. The object of this Amendment was to make it certain that there would be a reduction if the on-licences exceeded a certain number. The Amendment suggested a reasonable number in proportion to the population. In order to deal with the case of London it would be easy to institute a special class of licences for hotels, so that the ordinary drinking bar should be limited to some definite proportion. It was said that if this Amendment were adopted there would be an unlimited levy. There ought to be an unlimited levy. There ought to be power to make a levy in order to raise whatever amount of money was necessary to make the reduction that was deemed necessary.

Tellers for the Noes—Mr. Munro Ferguson and Mr. Herbert Lewis.

*Mr. ASQUITH: The Amendment which stands in the name of my hon. and learned friend the Member for Anglesey, and which I propose now to move, raises a question of interest and importance second to none in the whole Bill; it raises, in fact, the whole question of compensation. The Committee, I am sure, will not be surprised to hear that in submitting it I am embarrassed by the conditions under which I am compelled to speak. It is not as though I or anyone in this House was in the least degree entitled to complain of the time which has been occupied last night and this evening by previous Amendments. Point after point of the most serious importance has been barely and boldly stated to the House, and has been at once divided upon, without the advantage which, in Committee at any rate, we are accustomed to derive from the free play of informal, but not less useful, arguments across the floor of the House. A severe and, as some of my hon. friends would say, excessive self-restraint has been exercised. I am not at all sure that the results which have been achieved will be held to warrant its repetition. But at any rate, it is perfectly true that there has been no waste of time, no excess of talk, and no diversion of the attention of the House from serious and important to trivial and frivolous points. But when I approach this Amendment I cannot discuss it without considering its relation to, and its effect upon the remainder of this clause. What is the clause we are discussing? It contains twenty-two lines, of which we have discussed six. Upon the Order Paper at this moment there stand fifteen pages of Amendments, which I will not say remain for discussion, but which are to be ignored and passed aside without any discussion at all. They embrace some of the most important features of this Bill. But how am I, in the five minutes which are still to elapse before the guillotine falls, to say anything really useful or fruitful about that which is the vital and essential principle of this Bill? The provision in the lines which I have moved to omit, the provision which in future will restrain all power to refuse or reduce licences in conformity with the limited dimensions of a fund which will be small and exiguous, and in some parts of the country may not exist at all—this proposal, this far-reaching, deep-seated, and unprecedented revolution in the whole of our law of licensing is to pass now from this Committee unamended and even undiscussed. The procedure of the House of Commons is reduced to a farce. We are taking part in a parody of debate, and making ourselves accomplices in a caricature of the forms, and a betrayal of the spirit of Parliamentary institutions.

"In page 1, line 10, to leave out from the word 'but' to the end of line 12."—(Mr. Asquith.)

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) said he wished to ask on a point of order whether those Members of the House who were personally and pecuniarily interested in the result of the division were entitled to vote.

*The CHAIRMAN: The Rule of the House has always been that any Member who has a direct pecuniary interest is liable to have his vote struck off. I think I have correctly stated the Rule.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) asked, as a matter of practice, in order to avoid complications and difficulties in the future, at what time should objection be taken to the votes of Members who had a direct personal pecuniary interest? The proper manner, he knew, would be to take objection immediately after the division, but there were so many gentlemen involved that they could not immediately bring all the votes that should be challenged to the notice of the House. Could they save themselves by taking formal exception now and giving notice that when the division list was printed they would bring the question before the House?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The practice has always been to call the attention of the House to the matter directly the division is taken.

Tellers for the Noes—Mr Herbert Gladstone and Mr. William M'Arthur.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: Mr. Chairman, I desire to call your attention to the fact that in the last division a number of Members voted in contravention of a Standing Order of the House. I refer to Order No. 143 which precribes that—

> "A Member may not vote on any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest."

I am going to submit to you the names of several Members who have a direct pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of the last division, and who voted in support of that interest. There have been two divisions on the question of compensation—one at eleven o'clock and the other the last division. In the first the majority was sixty-nine, and of those sixty-three had a direct pecuniary interest in the subject. I will pick out one or two instances and ask the judgment of the House upon them. I will take first the case of the hon. Member for South Salford. I submit that that hon. Member has a direct pecuniary interest in the vote he has recorded; it was a vote in favour of giving compensation for the first time in respect of licences disallowed. Under the present law he would receive no compensation in respect of houses the licences of which were refused renewal by the magistrates. The moment this Bill becomes law it will add enormously to the value of his property; it will appreciate the value of the brewery shares he holds; and in respect of any houses which, in future, are disallowed he will receive a direct pecuniary advantage. In the circumstances, I submit that the vote of the hon. Member should be disallowed, and I move that the vote of the hon. Member for South Salford in the last division be disallowed on the ground that he had a direct pecuniary interest in the vote which he recorded.

*__Mr. CHAIRMAN__: There is no Standing Order that is applicable to the case. The book from which the hon. Member has quoted is not the Standing Orders, although I have no doubt that they are correctly stated in that book. The last ruling that I can find on the subject occurred on the Local Government (Ireland) Bill, 1898, when Mr. Speaker ruled as follows—

> "The Rule of the House is well understood. There must be a direct pecuniary interest of a private and particular nature, and not of a public and general nature; and where the question before the House is of a public and general nature, and incidentally involves the pecuniary interests of a class which includes Members of the House, they are not prevented by the Rules of the House from voting.

Therefore I do not think the Motion of the hon. Member would be in order.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I understand that Mr. Speaker's ruling was that where the pecuniary advantage was incidental the general rule would not apply. I submit, however, that here the advantage is not incidental, but that the whole object and purpose of this Bill and this clause is to confer a direct pecuniary interest upon this class, and, as a matter of fact, does confer it. Therefore, I submit, this case comes within the Standing Order.

*The CHAIRMAN: I know that view is taken by the hon. Member and by a great many other hon. Members, but I think he will admit that it is not the universal view. [Opposition cries of "It ought to be left to the House."] There is also this to be said, that it is perfectly possible that the hon. Member's financial position will not be affected in any way. [Opposition cries of "Let him say whether or not it is."] Will hon. Members kindly allow me to finish the sentence? Supposing that none of the licences in which he is interested are affected. The interest of the hon. Member is not of that direct personal character to which the ruling of Mr. Speaker refers.

Mr. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): May I call your attention to the Rule which says—

> "The Member whose vote is questioned by such a Motion may rise in his place to explain his position."

*The CHAIRMAN: I have already said that for the reasons I have given I do not think such a Motion as that which has been suggested can be properly moved

Mr. THOMAS SHAW (Hawick Burghs): As I understand, you have put the supposition to the Committee that the interest of the hon. Member may not be affected. I respectfully submit to you, Sir, that we should have that as a matter of fact, or otherwise, stated by the hon. Member.

Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham): May I quote a specific case? I believe it is the fact that the hon. Member had negotiations with the justices of Manchester in regard to certain houses in which he is interested and an arrangement had been practically come to whereby the licences of those houses were to be surrendered. But owing to the interview between the Prime Minister and the brewers a year ago—I think the hon. Member's own avowal has acknowledged that—those negotiations fell through. Can it, therefore, be argued after that that the hon. Member is not directly interested.

*The CHAIRMAN: I do not know anything about the facts referred to by the hon. Member. I base myself upon the ruling of Mr. Speaker in the case to which I have referred.

> ". . . . where the question . . . . is of a public and general nature—"

I think it is so in this case—["No."]—

> "and incidentally involves the pecuniary interest of a class which includes Members of the House they are not prevented by the Rules of the House from voting."

Mr. WHITTAKER: On the point of order may I submit that this is not a measure of a public nature; it does not incidentally include a class. It refers entirely to a class, and only to that class.

*The CHAIRMAN: I cannot accept the view of the hon. Member that this Bill does not deal with matters of a public nature.

Mr. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): May I point out that the rule begins by saying, "A Member may not vote on any question in which he has a pecuniary interest"?

*The CHAIRMAN: What Rule is that?

Mr. MOULTON: Rule 143. Surely it is a question of fact whether or not the Member whose vote is challenged has a direct pecuniary interest. May I suggest that it is not for you, Sir, as Chairman of Committees, to be, in your official character, so well-acquainted with his private affairs as to be able to pronounce whether a Member has or has not a direct pecuniary interest? The ruling that was given in May with regard to that says—

> "The interest must be a direct pecuniary interest, and separately belonging to the persons whose votes are questioned and not in common with the rest of His Majesty's subjects."

The hon. Member put it as a question of fact that in this case the vote with regard to the compensation for licences is a vote in a matter in which the Member, whose vote is challenged, has a direct pecuniary interest, and I submit that the House has a right to have that——

*The CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is entitled to submit a point of order to me, but I do not think he will be in order in making a speech on it. May I point out to the hon. Member that what he has quoted from is really a manual or guide? He has not quoted from the Standing Orders. The Standing Orders of the House do not refer to this matter, but I have quoted from the last decision of Mr. Speaker on the subject. Mr. Speaker decides points of order as they rise in the House, and it is my duty to decide upon points of order that arise in Committee.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL (Oldham) said, on the point of order, Sir, may I ask whether the conduct of the hon. Member in question falls within the ruling of Mr. Speaker which you have quoted, and is not rather a matter for the House than the Chair?

*THE CHAIRMAN: If it had been, Mr. Speaker would not have ruled it.

And, it being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ADJOURNMENT.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Sir A. ACLAND-HOOD, Somersetshire, Wellington) moved, "That the House do now adjourn."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) said he wished to ask a question with reference to the present position in Tibet. He understood that some information had been received in the course of the day with reference to certain operations which had taken place. He should like to know what the result of those operations had been, and also whether, in view of what had taken place, the time had not now arrived for the Government to give the House some indication of the effect of those operations with regard to their future policy. They wanted to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could now repeat the statement he made some months ago that the operations were at an end. What was the attitude of the Government with regard to this matter, and had any instructions been given to the officer in command of our forces there? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give the House some information which would lead them to believe that they were coming to an end of this sorry business.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL (Oldham) asked the right hon. Gentleman to explain why information received by the Government had been published in the newspapers before being communicated to this House.

MR. FLYNN (Cork County, N.) said he wished to call attention to the fact that the suzerain Power had not been consulted in this matter. It had been deliberately ignored, and the present operations were a distinct violation of the promises made by the Prime Minister on the floor of the House a short time ago. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the negotiations were to be of a peaceful character, and he said most distinctly that there was no intention of warlike operations, or of annexing or occupying territory. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give a distinct assurance that warlike operations would not be conducted against a peaceful people.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) said there was news going through the city in the afternoon that some operations had taken place. Why was the Minister in charge of the India Office not present to explain to the House what had happened? Was his office a mere sinecure? He thought it was a very great scandal that the right hon. Gentleman was not present. He was very well paid for being present.

MR. STUART SAMUEL (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked the right hon. Gentleman to be good enough to state whether there were any gold mines in Tibet.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said he wished to know what our position was with regard to China. Were we at war with China, or were we trying to put down some troubles in a country of which China was suzerain?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford) said he might be allowed to reply in the first place to the remarks of the hon. Member who spoke last but two. That hon. Gentleman's complaint was that he was not present to give information at Question time. As there were no Questions on the Paper addressed to him, and as no Member had given him private notice of his intention to ask for information, he was not actually in the House when the Question was put, but he had been in the precincts since the House met. If there had been any important communication to be made to the House he would not have failed to be present there. The Government had received no confirmation as yet of the information in Reuter's telegrams that afternoon as to the force at Gyangtse having occupied the Jong, but as soon as any information was received he would communicate it through the Press. [Loud cries of "To the House of Commons."] An hon. Gentleman had asked a Question as to the policy of His Majesty's Government. He thought it was too late an hour — [Loud OPPOSITION cries of "No, No!"]— to enter on a disquisition as to the work of His Majesty's forces in Tibet. All he could say was that the policy of His Majesty's Government had changed in no single particular from what was laid down in the telegram to the Viceroy of 6th November last year, and which had been repeatedly affirmed by the House. The operations of the last few days had led the Government to hope that, at last, Tibetan representatives would approach Colonel Younghusband; and a delay had been made in the advance to Lhasa, which had been fixed for the 25th of last month; but it appeared that the Tibetan representatives were not possessed of sufficient credentials, or of any credentials at all. They were there apparently simply to delay the advance of our troops, which it was desirable should not be delayed within the comparatively short time which should pass before the commencement of the Tibetan winter. At any moment negotiations might take place if the Tibetan authorities would send negotiators with sufficient powers to negotiate. It was not the desire of His Majesty's Government to ask for anything at variance with their previous declaration, or to make any more onerous conditions of reparation for what had taken place, and what the House had affirmed to be necessary.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said he thought that the explanation was very unsatisfactory. The point he wished to draw attention to was, that if the Government had received no special news from India, how was it that the Prime Minister had possessed himself of a telegram which he read to the House that afternoon? Had the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India read that telegram?

MR. BRODRICK: Telegrams are constantly passing between the India Office and the Viceroy.

MR. LOUGH said he thought the right hon. Gentleman was treating the matter with some levity. The telegram which the Prime Minister had read to the House stated that the bombardment of the Jong had commenced at a certain hour; but it was said that the result was not in the possession of the Government. He asked the Secretary for India whether any supplementary telegram had been received by the Government. When serious warlike operations of this kind were being undertaken, the Government ought to afford the House some information. He understood that a British officer had been killed and that other serious casualties had taken place, and he thought that some information should be given to the House. On the larger question raised about negotiations with the Tibetans, the right hon. Gentleman repeated that the Government desired to negotiate with them. But if these Tibetans did not desire to negotiate and wanted to simply live peacefully in their own land, was this policy of butchery and extermination to be carried out to the bitter end? Perhaps the Prime Minister would give the House some information. He was responsible for the Government. He was sure that it would be received with satisfaction by the country that there was some prospect that these cruel operations against a people practically unarmed would be put a stop to.

Question put, and agreed to.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL [H.L.].

[Third Reading.]

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3ª."—(Lord Wolverton.)

*Lord ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, before this Bill is read a third time I wish to make a few comments upon it. It is a measure to amend the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894. That Act by no means brought shipping legislation up to date. It did not alter the law at all. A reference to Hansard shows that it was described by the then Lord Chancellor as a codification of the existing law, and similar language was used in regard to it by Mr. Mundella and Mr. Bryce. It is true that some minor Acts have been passed since, but the law remains substantially what it was in 1894. The greater part of the Act of 1894 is therefore simply a recapitulation of the law as it existed more than half a century ago, when steam and electricity were in their infancy and the whole of the legislation as regards merchant shipping is in consequence very much behindhand. This Bill only deals with the fringe of some of the questions that will before long require solution.

I look upon this Bill as an instalment only. If it is found that the worst class of merchant ships will spontaneously adopt a scale of provisions better than the "pound and pint" scale, no one will be more agreeably surprised than myself, except, perhaps, the happy seaman who will actually eat the better ration. This Bill does not attempt to deal with the housing of the seaman. I am fully prepared to admit that this is a very difficult problem, far more so than the provisioning. But it ought not to be beyond the wit of man to devise remedies. I should suggest that the Board of Trade should tell the better class of shipowners that it is intended to legislate on the subject, and that it wishes for their advice as to the wording of the clauses so that they may not be inconvenienced by such legislation more than is absolutely necessary. If shipowners continue to adopt a non possumus attitude towards all changes in the law connected with the merchant seamen, there will always be a danger of a new Plimsoll agitation, and of hurried legislation in a passing fit of enthusiasm.

The merchant seaman has a peculiar claim on this House, because, from the very nature of his circumstances, he is about the only class of working man who is unrepresented in the House of Commons. Even if he is a married man with a house and home of his own, he is probably away at the time of an election. I have always thought that this House should look upon itself as being in some measure a trustee for the unrepresented portions of the community. As this Bill is a small step in the right direction, I hope that it may pass into law this year, and that during the recess the Board of Trade will reconsider all questions in connection with the merchant seaman, and that it will be ready with a fresh Bill in February. I may be too sanguine, but I am encouraged in this hope by the fact that a Select Committee of the other House is taking evidence on the broader aspects of these questions, especially as to how some of our restrictive regulations can be applied to vessels frequenting our ports under foreign flags.

LORD WOLVERTON: I am very glad to hear the welcome that my noble friend, who is so well qualified to speak on this subject, has given to the Bill. I have, of course, no power to initiate legislation, but I will undertake that the remarks he has made on the Third Reading shall reach the President of the Board of Trade.

On Question, Bill read 3^a, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE CASE OF THE "ANTILLIAN."

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I rise to call attention to the case of the captain of the British steamer "Antillian," who was lately imprisoned under degrading conditions in the common gaol at Vera Cruz by order of the Mexican authorities; and to ask whether it is a fact that the case has been dismissed by the Mexican Judge at Campeche, and the captain released unconditionally: also, whether, in regard to the representations made by the Merchant Service Guild, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has extended his support to the captain's claim for compensation for the unjustifiable treatment to which he has been subjected; and whether he is able to give any further information bearing on the case.

I feel that I must first express the great satisfaction that is felt at the way in which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has interested himself in regard to this matter. It cannot but be greatly appreciated by the captains and officers of our merchant ships, who in their dealings at foreign ports frequently experience great difficulties, and sometimes consider that their interests as British subjects are not always protected as they might be by representatives of this country abroad. I need only mention the case of the "Greylands," where two officers and some of the crew of a merchant vessel were confined in prison for nearly five months without trial, the cases of the "Isleworth" and the "Ivydene," and the case of the chief officer of the British ship "Kambira" to substantiate this.

In the particular case to which I am calling attention, however, there is absolutely no doubt that everything possible has so far been done by the noble Marquess, by the British Minister at the city of Mexico, Mr. Grant Duff, and by Mr. Consul Leay at Vera Cruz. They, as our representatives on the spot, deserve great credit. For your Lordships' information I will mention briefly the facts, which are that whilst the steamer "Antillian" was lying at Kingston, Jamaica, her captain was ordered by the agents of his owners at that port to carry a number of labourers to a place called Chencan, on the Mexican coast. A proper clearance was obtained at the Kingston Custom House stating the number of crew and passengers, and a bill of health for the port was also obtained. There was, however, no Custom House at Chencan, but the agents informed the captain that they had sent a cable to the city of Mexico, and that a Customs representative and doctor would meet the steamer at Chencan. On arrival these officials were not waiting the vessel, as expected, and consequently the captain thought it would be perfectly safe to land the labourers with their personal effects. Proceeding from thence to Vera Cruz all the papers were handed in to the Customs officials with the usual declaration form stating that the vessel landed the passengers and effects at Chencan, as I have mentioned. Everything was perfectly above-board, and three days after this the steamer finished discharging and was ready for sea.

To the surprise of all concerned the port authorities then detained the steamer, and, four days after, arrested the captain on a charge of smuggling contraband into Chencan. He was thereupon confined in the common gaol amongst criminals of the worst kind. This treatment was strongly protested against by Mr. Leay, the British Consul. After three days in what are described as "filthy surroundings and frightful atmosphere," the captain became ill, and though the British Consul used every endeavour to get him into a private ward, he was lodged in the criminal ward of the hospital, where the horrors are described by the captain as still greater. On the facts being communicated to him Mr. Duff, the British Minister at Mexico, at once interviewed the Mexican Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and as further delay arose he proceeded to the private residence of the Mexican Minister for Foreign Affairs. The result was that ultimately the captain was released on bail, amounting to 3,000 dollars, and the steamer was permitted to leave under a bond of, it is said, 20,000 dollars.

The Foreign Office, in communicating with the Merchant Service Guild, stated that they were informed that the captain appeared to be in a state of complete nervous prostration in consequence of his treatment, and that he had lodged a claim for compensation for £1,000 for himself and £3,000 on behalf of his owners, the steamer being detained. The Acting District Judge at Vera Cruz decided that the captain's trial should take place at Campeche, but that place being, if possible, even more unhealthy than Vera Cruz, the British Minister did everything in his power to have the decision reversed, but evidently without avail. Before proceeding to Campeche the captain was furnished by the British Consul at Vera Cruz with a letter to the British Vice-Consul at Progreso, as there is no British Consular Officer at Campeche. The agents of his line of steamers provided him with food, also a bed and mosquito curtain during his imprisonment, and retained counsel for his defence. The result, sofar as I have been able to gather, is that the judge at Campeche dismissed the case and referred it to the Custom House at Mexico City, whilst he informed the captain that he was at liberty to proceed to England.

Of course, I am not endeavouring to justify smuggling or anything of its character, but the circumstances are such as to show that in this case there has been nothing of the kind. Even were there suspicion of it, I venture to submit that the captain of a British merchant ship should command proper consideration in a case of this character. Apart from the outrageous treatment to which he has been subjected, and from which he has suffered very considerably in health, the captain of the "Antillian," on being imprisoned, lost the command of his vessel, which is really a very serious matter to him. It is, I think, necessary that when British subjects are imposed upon and treated in this scandalous way His Majesty's Government should step in. We know very well that a Mexican captain in one of our own ports would be treated far differently over a case similar in circumstances to that of the captain of the "Antillian." I hope to hear that the noble Marquess is supporting what I feel to be a reasonable and fair claim for compensation, and if he is able to give any further information it would be welcomed by very many who have been impressed by the cruel and unjustifiable treatment to which the captain of the "Antillian" has been subjected.

*The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of Lansdowne): My Lords, the account of this case which has reached me does not differ materially from that which the noble Lord has given to the House. It seems to me that, prima facie, Captain Wescott's treatment was of a harsh and unjustifiable character, and that it is the duty of His Majesty's Government to pursue inquiries into the matter. Of course, as the noble Lord has admitted, the landing of passengers and goods at a place which is not a port of entry and where there is no Custom House is, on the fact of it, an irregularity, but there is nothing to show that Captain Wescott was guilty of that irregularity deliberately. On the contrary, the evidence proves that he landed at Chencan in consequence of instructions received from the agents of the firm by whom he is employed. His ship was detained, and he was thrown into prison, and although he only remained in prison three days, he seems to have been subjected, to say the least of it, to very disagreeable and painful surroundings which occasioned him for the time a loss of health. He was eventually tried and, as the noble Lord has told your Lordships, the Court acquitted him of criminal responsibility, but the case was handed over to the Commissioner of Customs at Campeche.

Lord MUSKERRY: Mexico.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE: I believe he was handed over to the Commissioner of Customs at Campeche and that the matter was then referred to the Customs authorities at Mexico. The case is, I understand, still sub judice. Captain Wescott has claimed £3,000 as compensation for, the detention of his ship, and £1,000 for the personal ill-usage which he encountered. I understand that the Board of Trade are of opinion that some claim for compensation exists, but they do not desire to express any opinion as to the reasonableness of the amount claimed until we have received further information from our Chargé d'Affaires in Mexico, to whom the matter has been referred. I was very glad to hear the noble Lord admit that Mr. Grant Duff, as well as our Consul at Vera Cruz, had left nothing undone in their endeavours to secure redress for Captain Wescott. The papers which are before me show that Mr. Grant Duff spared no pains to convince the authorities that Mr. Wescott had been guilty merely of an error of judgment, and that no crime could be imputed to him. That is how the matter stands. We shall, no doubt, hear in due time from our Chargé d'Affaires; and if he should report that in his opinion a claim for compensation can be sustained, the noble Lord may rely upon it that we shall press the claim to the utmost of our ability.

THE MARITIME CONFERENCE AT BRUSSELS.

Lord MUSKERRY: My Lords, I rise to put the Question standing in my name, viz., whether a deputation consisting of representatives of the General Council of the Bar, the International Law Association, the Committee of Lloyd's, the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom, the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, the North of England Steamship Owners' Association, the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce, the Glasgow Shipowners' Association, and the Hull Chamber of Commerce and Shipping, has urged upon the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the necessity of His Majesty's Government being represented at the forthcoming International Maritime Conference at Brussels, in order to, among other things, promote greater uniformity in the maritime law of different nations; whether His Majesty's Government have declined to accede to the proposal, and, if so, for what reasons; also, whether, in view of the weight of public opinion on the subject, and its great importance to British shipping, His Majesty's Government propose to assist in any way in promoting uniformity in the maritime law of different nations.

Before dealing with this question I should like to give notice that I propose to ask the noble Marquess what protection the British flag is supposed to confer on its subjects, or others who are on board a vessel flying the British flag. My reason for doing this is that I have always been under the impression that though Custom House officers are allowed——

The LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of Halsbury): I would point out to the noble Lord that he is now transgressing the Rules of Order.

Lord MUSKERRY: May I put myself in order by moving the adjournment of the House?

The LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Lord has given notice of a Question which he proposes to ask on a future day, and is beginning to give arguments upon it. That is clearly out of order.

Lord MUSKERRY: Then I will proceed with the Question standing in my name on the Paper. When putting this notice down I had not seen the reply sent by the noble Marquess to the International Law Association. It is a refusal to be represented at this International Maritime Congress, and I quite acknowledge that there may be very good reasons for the noble Marquess's decision, but I would ask him to consider one point in the matter. As you know, whenever I have brought anything before your Lordships' House in the shape of precautions for safeguarding lives of men at sea I have always been met with the argument—and I suppose I shall continue to be until things are altered—that to adopt them would be placing our shipowners in an unfair position in competition with foreign nations who do not adopt them. I do not know what your Lordships think of that argument, but, in my opinion, it is extraordinary that because other nations do not take precautions for the safety of the lives of their subjects we in England should not do so, but should wait until they have joined in taking those precautions. It seems to me that there may be a possibility in this Maritime Congress, and in other similar congresses, of the British Government approaching other nations purely from a humanitarian point of view, and seeing if they will not join in an international arrangement for remedying what has not been denied is a great risk, not only to our own seamen but to the seamen of every other country on the high seas.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, it is the case that I had the honour of receiving some few weeks ago a deputation representing the important public bodies enumerated in the noble Lord's Question, and that the object of that deputation was to urge upon His Majesty's Government the necessity of their being represented at the forthcoming International Maritime Conference at Brussels. It is also the case that after consideration and inquiry I felt it my duty to inform the members of that deputation that His Majesty's Government did not propose to take part in the proceedings of that Conference. The reason which led us to that decision was this: in view of the great magnitude of British shipping interests we did not consider that it was desirable that this country should take such a part in a conference of the kind proposed as might have the effect of in any way committing us to measures adopted by other countries whose interest is infinitely smaller than ours, but whose representation upon such a conference would be equal to our own. That is a consideration which, I believe, has, on previous occasions, induced the Government of the day to abstain from taking part in similar inquiries. While I say that, I readily admit that we recognise the great importance of endeavouring to arrive, as far as possible, at uniformity in the maritime law of nations. In such matters, for example, as the law in regard to collisions, the salvage of ships, or pilotage, it is clearly desirable that the laws of different countries should, as nearly as may be, correspond; and, therefore, if it should result from the discussions of this conference that any proposals are made with that most laudable object, the noble Lord may rest assured that we shall be prepared to examine those proposals in the most friendly and considerate spirit.

THE PUPIL TEACHER SYSTEM.

LORD HERRIES: My Lords, I rise to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he will take into consideration the necessity of making special grants towards the travelling expenses of pupil teachers attending pupil teachers' centres in agricultural districts. My reason for putting this question is that I do not think the Board of Education quite realise the very great difference which will be entailed by the new regulations in the course of the education of pupil teachers—the very great difference there will be between the cost in towns and the cost in the country. The Board of Education have not, apparently taken into consideration the distance these pupil teachers will have to travel. I have asked the clerk to the education committee in the East Riding of Yorkshire to let me know what the travelling expenses of the pupil teachers are there, and he informs me that while the cost of education in three pupil teachers' centres only amounts to £450, the travelling expenses run to £400, very nearly as much as the cost of the education. In the towns that expense is saved, and it seems to me there should be some recognition of this fact and special grants made in agricultural districts in order to defray the extra cost.

It is bad enough as things are at present, but it will be worse when the new regulations come into force. Under the new regulations which will come into force next year, pupil teachers will not be allowed to serve more than half time in a public elementary school; they must receive half-time instruction at some pupil teachers' centre. That means that for two and a half days a week they will have to attend a pupil teachers' centre. Where we have now one pupil teacher in our schools we shall, therefore, have to have two, because they will have to attend half time at the centre; and if they are ten or twelve miles from the centre it will be necessary to pay their expenses backwards and forwards each day. The sum of £400, to which I have referred, is incurred with only one day a week; with two and a half days a week that expenditure will be enormously increased. In agricultural districts the cost of education is a very serious matter, and the unpopularity of the new Education Act is partly due to the fact that it will entail a very great expenditure upon the country.

For myself I must say I do sympathise with those agriculturists who have to pay in respect of education, I was going to say an income-tax, because it amounts to an income-tax in the case of many agriculturists. In some cases it amounts to 10, 15, and even 20 per cent. of their income. I know farmers paying £1,000 a year rent who are rated upon £1,000 a year, and having to pay 6d. in the £. I have no doubt that last year the education rate amounted to at least 10 per cent. of their income. Next year the expenditure upon pupil teachers will be very much greater. How they are going to get over the difficulty which faces them I do not know. It will be for the county councils to consider. There are several ways of getting over the difficulty, and I am afraid it will be found that in some counties, at any rate, a very unsatisfactory mode may be chosen. It will be possible, for instance, for a county council to come to the conclusion that the expenditure on training pupil teachers is so great that they will not train them, but will rely upon other towns and other cities to train them, feeling that by paying slightly higher salaries they will be able to procure a sufficient supply of teachers without having the expense of training them. That is one possible way of meeting the difficulty, but I think it is a very unsatisfactory one, and I should be very sorry to see that method carried into operation.

Another mode which may be selected by the county councils is that of starving the secondary schools. At present the grants received for the purposes of secondary education have been most beneficial. I have had the honour of being chairman of our education committee for twelve or fourteen years, and I can say this, that during the time these grants have been made the attendance at secondary schools has increased eight-fold. The advantage that has been conferred by these grants to secondary education has been enormous. I should be sorry to think that by the new scheme about to be introduced any injury should be done to the secondary education of the country, but I do fear that if we have to spend such an enormous sum of money upon the education of our pupil teachers that may possibly be the result. The third way of meeting the difficulty would be by having a rate, and I must say I deplore the necessity of imposing a rate for the purpose of giving instruction to pupil teachers in pupil teachers' centres. I hope, therefore, my noble friend the President of the Board of Education will take into consideration the very great difference between the cost of educating pupil teachers in the country and in towns. In towns, of course, the pupils can go from one school to the other by trams or 'buses and the cost is small, but in the country, if you have to take pupil teachers ten, twelve, or fifteen miles to the centre, the expense is very great. I think in this matter the country should be placed on equal terms with the towns.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (The Marquess of LONDONDERRY): My Lords, I certainly have no fault to find with the very moderate manner in which my noble friend has put this Question to me. I know full well, although I do not myself reside near the East Riding, the great interest which the noble Lord has always taken in everything connected with that Riding of Yorkshire, and the prominent part he has played in regard to education there. I am not sorry that my noble friend has raised this question, for I cannot but think that at the present moment there exists, not only in the minds of your Lordships, but throughout the country, a misapprehension as to the requirements of the pupil-teacher system. I do not think any noble Lords who have studied the question of education will contradict me when I say that the education of the pupil teachers is of enormous importance. It is the bounden duty of the education committees to see that those who are to instruct the rising generation have themselves had a proper training for that duty. We must recognise that the greater portion of the teaching staff in our elementary schools is recruited by means of our pupil-teacher system.

This system has existed now for considerably over fifty years, but up to two years ago it had not been in any way varied during that half century. Until the Act of 1902, I do not think there had been any alteration for the betterment of our system of pupil teaching. I do not wish to say anything on an occasion like this of a controversial character, but I doubt very much if noble Lords opposite have ever done anything in that direction. I do not think Mr. Acland, my predecessor at the Board of Education and a recognised educational expert, who did his utmost to discharge the duties attaching to the position, ever did anything himself to promote our pupil-teacher system, and, therefore, by the Act which became law in 1902, that system has for the first time received practical and useful aid from the Government of the day. I consider that enormous benefit will accrue to education in the future from that Act. I think our pupil-teacher system will receive enormous benefit from the provision in that Act which gives to the local authority in any area increased advantages in the promotion of the pupil-teacher system. If you go back to the foundation of this system, you will find that the only aid given was the grant paid to the elementary school where the pupil teacher was supposed to, and I presume did, teach; but until last year the sum paid to those teachers was, on an average, only about £2 per head per annum.

My noble friend laid great stress on the fact that extra expense would accrue from the new regulations of the Board of Education. I think my noble friend overlooked to a certain extent the fact that those regulations with regard to the pupil-teacher system are not compulsory but may be acted upon according to the requirements of the locality. There is no need in any area for any authority to rush headlong into any extra expense. They may take whatever course they like, and my own advice to my noble friend would be that he and his council should advance very slowly and cautiously, feeling their way in the line they propose to take. My noble friend evidently entertains the idea, and I am bound to say that I think it is an idea which is very generally held, that the regulations of the Board of Education have increased the expenditure of local authorities under the particular head to which reference is made. [" Hear, hear !"] With due deference to my noble friends who say " Hear, hear," I do not think they quite realise what the Board of Education has done in respect of these regulations, which, as I say, are not compulsory. I do not think they have realised the great importance which we naturally attach to the pupil-teacher system and the fact that we have been able to induce the Exchequer to give us largely increased grants in order to develop and improve the system.

The Board of Education issued last year some new regulations on this important matter in which, amongst other things, it was provided that a completely new grant became payable for the preliminary education in preparatory classes of boys and girls likely to become pupil teachers; and further, that the existing grant of £2 for the education of each pupil teacher was raised to £3 wherever such pupil teacher was receiving proper instruction in a well-equipped centre. Since then, in spite of the admittedly difficult financial situation this year, the Board of Education has been privileged to announce that both of these grants are this year to be doubled; that is to say, that whereas in previous years before 1903 practically no grants were payable for the preliminary education of boys and girls about to become pupil teachers, there will this year be payable for this purpose from the Exchequer as much as £4 per head. And in respect of each pupil teacher properly instructed in a well-equipped centre there will be payable a grant of £7 per head, including therein the grants hitherto payable in respect of pupil teachers instructed in science and art classes. I think your Lordships will thus admit that, so far from increasing the burden of local authorities, the present Government have taken very long steps indeed towards alleviating the burden of local authorities in this respect.

I do not for one moment contradict what my noble friend said as to the difference between urban and rural districts. Undoubtedly in towns there are facilities which do not exist in the rural districts. I should like to be able to tell my noble friend honestly what it is possible for us to do to meet the incontestable difficulty to which he has referred, but I am sure the noble Lord would not ask me to make any premature statement or hold out to him any hope of meeting his demands which it would be impossible for me to realise. Considering the short time that the Education Act has been in force, it is impossible for us at the Board of Education to make any accurate estimate as to what may be the number of pupil teachers in the coming education year, which begins on 1st August. I am obliged, therefore, to tell my noble friend that I cannot give him any definite answer at the present moment as to what we can or cannot do. I hope, however, that before the autumn we shall have obtained statistics from the various areas, with which we are in constant communication, as to the number of pupil teachers who require this assistance. Again, I say we shall lay special stress on the fact that those in rural districts require greater assistance than those in urban districts; but until we have received the returns and been able to carefully examine the statistics and formulate some plan by which we can meet the requirements of these districts, I do not think it would be wise on my part to make any promise.

I hope that when we have formulated our plan we shall be able to meet some of these requirements, and be placed in a position to ask for even further aid from the Exchequer. But at the same time it must be understood that although we may, and I believe we shall, receive further aid from the Exchequer, I cannot promise to earmark the manner in which that extra aid is to be expended. Circumstances vary in different areas, and what might be an advantage to my noble friend in the rural district in which he takes such a great interest might not be an advantage in other more thickly populated districts. I can assure my noble friend that I sympathise with all that he has stated. It may be said that it would be convenient to local authorities that we should state what amount of money we expect to get, and the manner in which we propose to distribute it, but it is impossible at the present moment for me to give any definite answer on that point. I can only assure my noble friend that when that money comes in we shall endeavour to administer it in such a way as shall be satisfactory to the local authorities, whether they be urban or rural.

Lord HENEAGE: My Lords, I am glad my noble friend behind me has elicited from the noble Marquess an acknowledgement that there is a great difference between agricultural and urban districts. The real question is not whether county councils in the great agricultural districts, which are thinly populated and very badly supported by railroads, are obliged to go to this expense, but whether you wish to keep up the pupil-teaching system or not. I imagine that at the present time a great number of school managers in the large counties, like Lancashire, where the pupil teachers have to go a considerable distance to the centres, and where the railway accommodation is as bad as it is possible to conceive, are considering whether they will in future send pupil teachers at all to those centres. I am sure the noble Marquess, after what he has said, will agree that it is highly essential that we should train as many pupil teachers as possible both in agricultural and urban districts; but the facts have to be looked in the face.

I have had considerable experience as one of the managers of elementary schools, and I am certain of this, that it is impossible to carry out this particular provision of the Act of 1902 at the present moment. If pupil teachers are to give up one half of their time each day to attending these centres, it practically means giving up the whole of the five days, or, if they are to go for two and a half days, it means that they will have to give up three days. Therefore, if you are to have education going on in the future it will be necessary to engage two pupil teachers where you now have one, or you will have to give up sending these pupil teachers to the centres at all. I think a great deal might be done by altering the rates which they are paid in the country and in the town districts. In the towns they can go to the centres after they have done all their work, or, at any rate, after they have done a good half-day's work and at no expense to the school managers; but in the agricultural districts it is quite impossible for them to do so. There is another point I should like to bring to my noble friend's attention, and I do it with the full knowledge that he will look thoroughly into all these questions. Before the Act of 1902 came into force, school managers were in the habit of paying schoolmistresses for giving, out of hours, extra education to the pupil teachers, but they cannot do that now. The county councils are not enabled to pay anything whatever. As they have no money of their own, they cannot pay schoolmistresses, with the result that pupil teachers have to absolutely rely for any instruction they get out of school hours upon the pupil teachers' centres, which it will be impossible in many agricultural districts for them to attend.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, I did not think when I saw this notice on the Paper that it would have grown into a discussion on the pupil-teacher system. I feel, with the noble Lord who called attention to this matter, that the problem of securing teachers in the rural districts is one of the most difficult problems that those concerned in education have to face. I do not put it so much on the question of cost; it is a very difficult matter to get them at all, and, when you have got them, to give them anything like a proper training. I could not follow the noble Marquess in what he said as to the new regulations. There have, I know, been certain notifications as to the postponement of some of the provisions of the new Pupil-Teachers' Minute, both as to age and as to the time of coming into operation, but they have been merely temporary postponements.

The new regulations for pupil teachers contemplate that very soon nobody in towns will be able to become a pupil teacher until he or she has turned sixteen. The period of pupil teachership is cut down to two years, but in rural districts it is three years. Formerly the period was four years. Recollect that these pupil teachers are to be half-timers throughout. I think that is admirable and absolutely necessary. But let me say that this half-time need not be worked each week; so long as the pupil teachers do so many days a year they may take them at a time convenient to themselves. Therefore, the Board of Education, I admit, has aimed at making this comparatively easy. What I complain of in the new Minute is that the Board of Education have tried to jump to what may be called a comparatively ideal system of training pupil teachers at a moment when it was very important not to dislocate the system, and when the improvements ought to have been introduced carefully and step by step with ample notice, because, as I have no doubt the noble Marquess will agree, the great difficulty at the present moment is where to find teachers at all. There is a great demand for better teachers. The competition is much keener than it was, and at this moment there is not only nothing substantial done to increase the supply of teachers, but the new Minute will, I feel confident, very greatly diminish the sources of supply that now exist. I was a little surprised to hear the noble Marquess say that from the establishment of the pupil-teacher system down to 1902 the system had remained stereotyped, and that nothing had been done to improve it. My recollection of the history of education does not at all correspond with that of the noble Marquess. When Mr. Lowe in his Code aimed at economies, unfortunately those economies struck at the root of the best part of education. He cut down the liberal grants to pupil teachers, he cut down the hours during which they must be instructed by their head teacher, and he left them very much at the mercy of the managers. They were thereby turned into a cheap auxiliary staff instead of pupils being gradually trained to become teachers hereafter. I feel compelled, however, to remind the noble Marquess that there have been improvements, though they have been more pressed upon the Board of Education than granted voluntarily.

Until the Cockerton judgment a great deal was done to train pupil teachers, but now, unfortunately, there obtains in the Board of Education a desire largely to sever the recruiting of pupil teachers from elementary schools. I view with very great apprehension the difficulties we shall go through in the next few years. Let me remind the noble Marquess that if he will read the evidence and the Report of the Departmental Committee, over which Mr. Sharpe, so long chief inspector of the Board, presided, he will see that some time before 1902 a very careful review of the pupil-teacher system and very valuable recommendations for its improvement were presented, and that review and those recommendations did really embody what was the practice of the best school boards at that time. When the noble Marquess paraded the recent liberality of the Government in having increased the grants to pupil teachers, he might have remembered that that liberality took the form of giving back a pound or two of that which had been previously taken away. In old days pupil teachers might get £3 or £4 a year, and it was spread over a longer period. Now the grant will be £2 at the earlier stage, when they will be studying mainly in secondary schools as full-timers at a cost of £8 or £10 a year.

When the noble Lord who initiated this discussion spoke of the possible courses that might be taken to get over the difficulty he said that one course which presented itself was that of giving up the training of pupil teachers altogether and of relying on neighbouring districts for recruiting the staff. I think that would be a most disastrous course to take. If each district tries to poach on its neighbour there will soon be no supply in any district. It is difficult enough to get pupil teachers in the rural districts as it is, and, if the Board of Education enforce their own regulations, it will become more difficult, because the Board have in the Code a theoretical rule, that pupil teachers should only be allowed in schools where they could be well trained, and where the size of the staff and the school are such as to render it possible to train them. There are many rural schools, therefore, which cannot possibly have pupil teachers. I am quite sure that the only way in which you will get pupil teachers under any conditions similar to those that now prevail in the regulations will be through cheap secondary schools, by founding small scholarships and getting the promising children from the elementary schools to come in, as day scholars it may be, on the understanding that if they spend a couple of years in these schools they will pass on to become pupil teachers.

Lord Stanley of Alderley.

The problem in the rural districts is quite a different one from that in the towns. I do not want to go into controversial matters to-night, but merely to contribute a few practical suggestions. I agree with the noble Marquess that it would be a pity, when he gives more liberal grants, to earmark them for this or that. The habit of earmarking grants is a mischievous one; it makes local authorities think they are only to teach that for which they are paid. The trouble is that under the present law there is no duty imposed upon any local authority with reference to the training or preparation of pupil teachers. Previous to the Cockerton judgment the duty of instructing pupil teachers was one of the obligations of the Code, failure to perform which would have led the Board of Education to declare the school board authority in default; but it was declared in that judgment that it was illegal for them to perform the duty of giving this instruction. The Government might, if they had chosen, have corrected that peculiar decision by indicating that the training of pupil teachers should be a part of the duty of the authority charged with elementary education. It would then have come under the elementary rate, which is not limited in amount; but instead of that, they declared that it should be a branch of secondary education. Moreover, by turning children out of the elementary schools at fifteen and not taking them as pupil teachers till they are sixteen you run the risk of a gap in the school career which will make you lose many promising candidates. But the rights of local authorities under the secondary education part of the Act are permissive, and carry with them no duties. No school managers can call upon the local authority to do one atom for the teaching of pupil teachers, because that is a branch of secondary education which is discretionary and not compulsory. The difficulties, as I have said, are very great, and I think the Board of Education will do well to put forward some further Memorandum indicating how they suggest that local authorities should battle with this question, because it is a serious one and one on which some help from the Board of Education will be useful.

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, there was one remark made by the noble Marquess which I should like to correct. He rather twitted our side of the House by saying he did not think we were aware of the great importance of this pupil-teacher question. I protest against that. There are many Members on this side of the House who have taken a prominent part in education and who are fully cognisant of its great importance. For the new educational authorities the question is a serious one, and I think we ought to be very grateful to my noble friend for bringing the matter forward, for we have had a very useful and interesting discussion upon it. The speech of the noble Lord who spoke last was full of the information which he possesses almost more than anyone else on this subject, and we ought to thank him very much for his contribution to the discussion. I venture to say that in connection with this subject there is no question now so important as an increase of places where teachers and pupil teachers can be properly trained.

At this moment thee ducation of pupil teachers is relegated to secondary education. In many counties we have hardly been able to develop that at all, and the consequence is that there is an almost entire blank from the old system to the new with regard to the instruction of pupil teachers. One thing has been brought out most clearly to-night, and I think it is fully appreciated by the noble Marquess, and that is, that in considering this great subject—and it will have to be considered in great detail—it must be remembered that there is a great difference between rural and urban requirements. I am afraid from what I have seen, and from the little experience I have had in this matter lately, that some of the regulations put forward—I am not sure that they have not been somewhat modified since—did impose severe terms with regard to pupil teachers' centres which would very greatly add to the difficulties surrounding this subject, particularly in rural districts. The noble Lord who spoke last made what was no doubt a very wise suggestion with regard to that. I think the debate has been a useful one, and will impress upon the noble Marquess the great difficulties there are connected with this important subject, and I trust that the Board of Education will take all these matters that have been referred to into consideration, and will give such assistance to the local authorities as will enable them to supply what is so much needed, a greater number of teachers and also of pupil teachers.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Electricity in Mines.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, seeing that the recommendations of the Electricity in Mines Departmental Committee are in some respects opposed to the latest practice adopted by the electrical engineers of corporation and traction companies, and are therefore opposed by engineers, he will, to expedite the passing of a uniform set of rules, ask the Coalowners' and Miners' Associations to form a joint committee to agree to the main recommendations of this Committee which are not the subject of any serious controversy.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) I am not aware that the Committee's recommendations are opposed to the latest practice of the engineering profession. One of the members of the Committee was a distinguished engineer, and the Committee received very great assistance from that profession in their inquiry. I do not propose to delay the establishment of the rules by referring them to a further committee as suggested. The rules have been for some time under the consideration of the Owners' Association assisted by a number of electrical engineers, and the communications received lead me to hope that, subject to modifications on some minor points, the recommendations generally of the Committee (on which I may add the miners were ably represented) will be accepted.

MR. MARKHAM: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, seeing that the Electricity in Mines Committee recommended that the application of special electrical rules should be left in the hands of His Majesty's Inspectors of Mines, he will, in view that most of the inspectors have had no practical experience whatever of electrical work, ask the House to vote the necessary money to enable him to appoint a sufficient number of electrical inspectors so that an inspection could be made by these inspectors at least once a year at all collieries where electrical plant is installed; and will he say how many deaths occurred last year in mines and shafts due to electricity.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) The view of the Committee was that the enforcement of these, as of all other special rules, should be left in the hands of the inspectors of mines, and I agree with that view. The appointment of special inspectors for the purpose would be undesirable. If, however, as the matter proceeds, it should appear that there is any necessity for it, I shall be prepared to consider the possibility of giving the inspectors the assistance of expert advice in the matter. The number of deaths last year in mines from electric shock was four.

Labourers' Cottage Schemes in Ireland.

MR. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to how many estates inquiries have been made under Section 96 of the Land Act of 1903 with respect to accommodation for labourers; how many schemes have been framed, or are about to be framed, by the Land Commission providing therefor; how many of such schemes have been forwarded to the Local Government Board and the rural district councils; what are the names of the estates and the counties dealt with in such schemes; and whether the Estates Commissioners will consider the desirability of having inquiries made from the labourers themselves, as well as from other persons on each estate inspected.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The number of estates inspected and reported on to the present date is 365; 250 of these have been before the Estates Commissioners for their consideration and ruling, but the remainder have not yet reached that stage. Schemes have been framed in the case of ten estates, and representations in respect of them will be forwarded in due course to the Local Government Board and rural district councils concerned. The ten estates referred to are as follows:—

Perrin-Hatchell, county Wexford.
Sir G. Morris, county Galway.
Earl FitzWilliam, county Wicklow.
W. H. Sinclair, county Tyrone.
M. J. Sullivan, county Kilkenny.
J. C. Wood, county Cork
E. S. Parke, county Waterford.
G. P. Colley, county Kildare.
H. V. Brooke, county Down.
W. C. Moore, county Wexford.

The inspectors are instructed to make their inquiries locally and of all such persons as they may consider to be in a position to enable them to form an opinion.

Cruelty to Horses in Mines—Visits of Home Office Inspectors.

MR. BROOKE ROBINSON (Dudley): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that during the Committee stage of The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, words were inserted requiring the Government inspector to examine and inquire into the case of animals used in the mine; whether his attention has been drawn to a case of continuous cruelty to a number of horses in a mine at Fenton, in North Staffordshire, belonging to the Staffordshire Coal and Iron Company, in which, upon a prosecution by Mr. Colam at the instance of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty, at Longton, last Wednesday, the stipendiary magistrate, in sentencing the manager of the mine to two months imprisonment with hard labour, expressed his surprise that any Government official could go into the pit and not see the condition of these horses; whether the Home Office have received reports showing that the mine inspectors throughout the country are actively carrying out the provisions of the Act in connection with animals; and can he say how many, if any, prosecutions for cruelty have been instituted at the instance of a Government inspector.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) The case to which I understand my hon. friend to refer was reported to me by the Inspector of Mines last month, and I at once instructed the Treasury solicitor to take proceedings. Before they were instituted, however, the inspector learnt that the matter had already been taken up by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. He reported this to me, stating that he thought it would be best to await the result of these proceedings. The magistrate, I imagine, could not have been aware of these facts when he made the remarks mentioned in the Question. Instructions are given to inspectors of mines to examine into the care and treatment of horses. I have every reason to believe that these instructions are obeyed. During the last three years seventy-seven prosecutions have been taken for cruelty to animals in mines; of these twenty-five were proceedings by inspectors, in the remainder the proceedings were taken by the owners of the mines.

Pay of Season Substitutes at Bristol Telegraph Office.

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe): To ask the Postmaster-General whether, seeing that in 1903 season substitutes in the Telegraph Office, Bristol, were paid at the rate of 27s. per week for the men and 20s. per week for women, he will explain why for the current season the men are being paid 18s. per week and the women 15s. per week.

(Answered bg Lord Stanley.) At Bristol last year it was necessary to employ several qualified assistants pending a revision of the staff (which has since been authorised), and exceptionally high rates of pay had to be given to secure experienced officers, but the high rates mentioned were not paid in every case. This year, however, no such conditions exist, and the wages paid are sufficient to obtain the services of the few persons temporarily required.

Overtime in Ludgate Circus Post Office.

MR. HORNER (Lambeth, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the counter clerks and telegraphists stationed at the Ludgate Circus Post Office were asked to volunteer for overtime from midnight until 3 a.m. as a temporary measure during the pressure occasioned by the South African War; and that since the conclusion of the war the men have still been kept on until 3 a.m. although they have asked to be relieved; and, if so, whether, in view of the fact that the inspector has now ordered the staff to perform 7.45 p.m. to 3 a.m. duty, he will investigate the circumstances of the case.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) I am aware of the circumstances at the Ludgate Circus Office to which the Member for Lambeth refers. It is necessary for the office to be kept open for telegraph business until 3 a.m. on five nights a week, but arrangements are already being made for the overtime to be abolished, and for the additional attendance beyond midnight to form part of a regular and continuous duty.

Charges for Letters addressed to Cromer Post Office.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that persons sending for their letters to the Cromer Post Office are charged threepence for a single letter and one penny for every additional ten letters; and, if so, will he say whether this system exists in any other post offices, and, if so, whether he will take steps to withdraw these charges.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) I fear that there has been some misapprehension at the Cromer Post Office respecting the rules as to the delivery of letters to callers. I will have the matter put right at once.

Zanzibar—Direction of Affairs during Sultan's Minority.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what arrangements are in force for the direction of affairs at Zanzibar during the Sultan's minority; whether a deputation recently came to England to complain to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the proceedings of the Regent; and, if so, whether the complaints were inquired into.

Whitstable Charities—Alleged Misuse of Endowment.

MR. SLACK (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): To ask the Secretary to the Board of Education whether by letter dated 12th March, 1903, the Board of Education requested the Charity Commissioners to divert an endowment properly payable to the Kent education authority for the payment of teachers' salaries at Whitstable, in that county, and appropriate it to the payment of debts incurred or about to be incurred by the trustees of the Whitstable and Seasalter National School; and, if so, whether the Board of Education will inform the Charity Commissioners that they now desire that the endowment shall be paid to the local education authority, as directed by Section 13 of the Education Act, 1902, and that if the managers of that school wish to enlarge the school-house such enlargement shall be carried out by means of funds provided by the managers, as directed by Section 7 of the same Act.

(Answered by Sir William Anson.) On the 12th March, 1903, the Board requested the Charity Commissioners to take up the conduct of the case, which was one of a "mixed charity," and therefore subject to the jurisdiction of the Commissioners. The Board at the same time expressed the opinion that it was desirable that the trustees' proposal with respect to the improvement of the school buildings, and the arrangement for the repayment of any loan which might be raised for the purpose, should be laid before the local education authority. This having been duly done by the trustees, and the scheme having been communicated by the Commissioners to the urban district council, with the result that no objection was raised during the period of publication, which expired on the 27th May last, and expenditure having now proceeded on the faith of the sanction of the Commissioners, the Board do not consider that they can intervene in the manner suggested. No difference between the local education authority and the trustees with reference to the application of the income of the endowment has been referred to the Board under the provisions of Section 13 (1) of The Education Act, 1902.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause of the delay in sanctioning the erection of the proposed national school at Knocknagin, county Derry, considering that some months ago the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland promised the reverend manager that they then expected shortly to be able to give a definite answer on the subject.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) In this case the manager elected to postpone the erection of the building pending a decision on the question of the revision of the plans and estimates for schoolhouses, in respect to which I would refer to the statement made by my hon. friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury on the 26th May last year.†

Police House-to-house Visits in the Moy District.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain by whose authority, and for what reason, the police are going from house to house in the district of Moy, county Tyrone, demanding the names of persons connected with the Orange Society.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The inquiries made by the police had reference to the contemplated movements of the different bands and drumming parties on 1st and 12th instant, to enable arrangements to be made for the preservation of the peace on those dates. Such inquiries are usual, but no inquiries of the character mentioned in the Question were made.

Distribution of Guns captured in the South African and Chinese Wars.

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the London County Council have refused the offer of the War Office of some of the guns captured in the South African and Chinese Wars; and whether he has made, or will make, a similar offer to some of the provincial towns.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) The allotment of guns captured in the South African and Chinese Wars was made in accordance with the recommendations of a Committee, which duly weighed the claims of units and of public bodies to these trophies. No letter has been received in the War Office from the London County Council refusing the guns allotted to that body; but, should such refusal be received, the guns would be allotted to some other town within the boundary of the 4th Army Corps.

Reconstruction of Queen Anne's Bounty Fund.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will, at an early date next session, bring in the promised Bill for the reconstruction of the Queen Anne's Bounty Fund administration and its amalgamation with the Ecclesiastical Commission.

(Answered by Mr. A. J. Balfour.) I certainly hope that the time may be found next session for proceeding with this measure.

ORDER OF QUESTIONS.

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent) asked Mr. Speaker how it was that a Question which he had put down to the Secretary for War, and which stood No. 1 on the Order-book, had that day been placed No. 42. He knew that it was the practice to put all Questions to the Prime Minister late in the sitting, but he thought it extremely inconvenient that the Questions to other Ministers should be moved about in that way.

*MR. SPEAKER said that when the new rule as to "Questions" was settled two years ago it was suggested by the First Lord of the Treasury, with the general assent of the House, that the Questions should be so arranged as to ensure that those addressed to Ministers specially busy in their Departments should be placed near the end of the list, and the Secretary for War was one of those Ministers who had been deemed to be entitled to this consideration.

MR. COGHILL: Could not the change be made earlier? I find my Question stood No. 1 in the Order-book this morning.

*MR. SPEAKER: I will inquire as to that.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Warrant Officers and Navigating Duties.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the warrant officers who have successfully passed through a course of navigation under the new Admiralty scheme are being, or will be, appointed to ships on which they will have navigating duties.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. PRETYMAN, Suffolk, Woodbridge): This new course is of such recent institution that no vacancy has yet occurred to which any of the small number of warrant officers who have passed through it could be appointed. They will, however, be considered for appointment to any vacancies as they occur.

Felixstowe Martello Tower.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether certain land, the property of the War Department, on which a Martello tower stands, at Felixstowe, has recently been sold; whether it was sold by public tender; and, if not, will he explain why; and whether, in the case of the sale of similar land, the War Office will offer the same for sale by public auction.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT, Cheshire, Macclesfield): As a general rule sale by public tender is resorted to, but in the present case an expert adviser considered that the circumstances were not favourable for public sale, the market being somewhat depressed. The price realised by private negotiation was very largely in excess of any reserve which would have been put upon the land in view of its actual market value.

Ball and Dummy Cartridges.

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has now received any report as to the circumstances under which William Hill, of Fenton, a private in the 4th Battalion North Staffordshire Militia, met his death recently at Lichfield; and whether his attention has been called to the recommendation of the jury at the inquest that in future a distinction should be made between dummy and ball cartridges.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: A report has been received from the General Officer commanding the North-Western District, from which it appears that it is not possible to state definitely how this round of ball cartridge got into the bag containing dummy cartridges. As regards preventing a recurrence of this regrettable accident, inquiry is being made as to whether the distinction which now exists between ball and dummy cartridges cannot be made more marked. Orders have also been issued enjoining greater care in the issue and return of unexpended ball ammunition.

MR. COGHILL: Will any compensation be made to the relatives of Private Hill?

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: I must ask the hon. Member to give notice of that Question.

Chinese Labourers for the Transvaal.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, if he will state how many men, women, and children respectively formed the second party of Chinese who have lately embarked for the Transvaal.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): I am informed that 1,971 emigrants sailed on the "Ikbal"; no women and children; eleven registered married. 1,988 sailed on the "Swanleigh"; no women and children; 394 registered married men.

Maltese Balance-Sheet.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that three months have elapsed since the close of the financial year in Malta, he will undertake that a copy of the balance-sheet for the year will be available for Members of the House before the Vote on the Colonial Estimates is taken.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have communicated the hon. Member's Question to the Governor of Malta, but pending the receipt of his reply, which I have requested him to furnish by telegraph, I am unable to state at what date the financial statements for the year ending 31st March last will be ready.

The Operations in Tibet.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Have His Majesty's Government any further news from Tibet.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): Is there any information as to what the approximate losses of the enemy were.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I telegraphed this morning to the Government of India, but I have not yet received from them any account of the operations yesterday at Gyangtse, nor have I yet heard from them whether the account published in the newspapers is correct.

MR. LOUGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the House on the adjournment?

MR. BRODRICK: Certainly, if I have any information.

Seizure of the "Allanton."

SIR CHARLES CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can now state the reasons given by the Russian Prize Court at Vladivostock for the confiscation of the British steamer "Allanton" and her cargo; and, if not, when he will be able to give the information.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl PERCY, Kensington, S.): His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg has asked the Russian Government for an official statement of the grounds upon which the vessel and her cargo were condemned. The information, when furnished, will at once be communicated to the parties interested.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.) asked if the grounds for the decision were the passage of the vessel through the Japanese Sea, instead of the Pacific, the presence on board of a Japanese cabin boy, the absence of proof that the Japanese company had sold the coal to a neutral party, and that the Judge was convinced that the steamer was not bound to Singapore, but to a Japanese or Korean port.

EARL PERCY said he should like to have notice of that Question.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.): Has any protest been sent by the British Foreign Office to St. Petersburg

EARL PERCY: There can be no question of protesting until we have the official statement.

Pemba Freed Slave's Appeal.

MR. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has received the report giving the result of the appeal by the freed slave Mshangama against the judgment of Mr. J. P. Farler, the Zanzibar Government Slavery Commissioner at Pemba, in the case of an action brought against Mshangama by his former master; and, if so, is he in a position to communicate that result.

EARL PERCY: The judgment delivered by Assistant Judge Skinner Turner, who held the inquiry into the case on appeal, has been received. He holds that the interpretation of the Decree of 1897 never came into the case and sees no reason to reverse the decision of the Collector either as to his facts or his law.

MR. BAYLEY: Will the noble Lord lay on the Table a copy of the judgment?

EARL PERCY: I should like to have notice of that.

Expenditure on the East African and Uganda Protectorates.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if, in view of the fact that the Estimates, Class 5, Vote 2, only show the gross sums necessary for the East Africa and Uganda Protectorates, he will supply more detailed Estimates for the use of Members of the House.

EARL PERCY: No, Sir. The Estimates are presented in the same form as the Estimates for the protectorates which are under the control of the Colonial Office and it is not proposed to alter the existing practice.

MR. BUCHANAN: They are not Estimates but merely a statement of the grant in-aid.

Collection of New Taxes.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Section 18 of the Customs Law Consolidation Act, 1876 (which provides that when new duties of Customs are imposed former ones are to continue until the new become chargeable) is held to justify Collecting Departments in enforcing new taxes from the date of the Vote in the Committee of Ways and Means imposing the same; and, if so, whether this interpretation extends to all new taxes, whether duties of Customs or not; and whether there has ever been any judicial decision to this effect.

MR. CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): Section 18 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, relates to the Customs only. It contains a statutory recognition of the practice of collecting new duties of Customs imposed by Resolution of the House of Commons from such date as is provided by the Resolution. The practice itself rests on ancient usuage in regard to Customs and Excise duties. The procedure is the same with regard to the collection of income-tax which is a tax annually imposed; but it has never been extended to stamp duties. The hon. Member will find an interesting note on the subject on page 556 of the tenth edition of "May's Parliamentary Practice." There has not been any judicial decision on the subject.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the words of Section 18 on which he relies.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: If the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to look at the Act he will find them in a moment.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I have looked at the Act and I am puzzled to know on what words the right hon. Gentleman relies.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I am afraid I can add nothing to my Answer.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Does the Act give statutory protection for this collection of Customs duties only.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, the section refers to Customs duties only. The practice has not been applied to the stamp duties, but it has to the Excise.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Will the hon. Gentleman consider the propriety of introducing into the Finance Bill some clause giving statutory authority.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Notice must be given of that.

Irish Excursion Trains --Lack of Sanitary Accommodation.

MR. JORDAN (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that an excursion train, with about 600 members and their friends of the Catholic confraternity, left Enniskillen on the morning of the 3rd inst. for Dublin, upwards of 120 miles, and returning on the evening of the same day; and that on that train, crowded with passengers of all ages and both sexes, there was no lavatory nor sanitary accommodation whatever; and, in view of the comfort and health of the excursionists carried by this line to and from all points thereof, will he continue his good offices to rectify this state of affairs.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I have no information on the subject other than that supplied me by the hon. Member himself, but I am directing the attention of the railway company to the complaint contained in his Question.

Borough Recorders and the Licensing Bill.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has arrived at any determination as to omitting in Clause 7, Sub-section (2), of the Licensing Bill, the proviso that the recorder of a county borough, having a separate Court of quarter sessions, must be a member and chairman of any committee of the justices.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): Yes, Sir; I propose to omit from the Bill the provision as to the recorder of a county borough, to which my hon. friend refers.

Motor-Cars in London Streets—Speed Regulations.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether any suggestions have been made to him by the authorities in control of the London street traffic to regulate the speed of motor-cars in crowded thoroughfares.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. GRANT LAWSON, Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): An application has been made by the Corporation of the City of London for a regulation restricting the speed of motor-cars within the City to ten miles an hour, and this is now under consideration. No application of the kind has been received as regards the rest of London, nor have suggestions been made to the Department on the subject by the authorities concerned.

Cheshire County Council and Non-provided School Teachers' Agreements.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Board of Education whether his attention has been called to the circular issued by the Director of Education of the Cheshire County Council, on 2nd May, 1904, stating that the Director of Education is authorised to withhold his consent, on behalf of the committee, to all agreements entered into between the managers of non-provided schools and teachers in such schools, unless such agreements are on the form prescribed by this committee; that all advertisements for teachers in elementary schools in the county elementary education area are to be forwarded for him to insert into suitable papers, and that no advertisements are to be issued otherwise; and, if so, whether, in view of the provisions of the Education Act, 1902, with regard to the appointment of the principal or assistant teachers in non-provided schools, he will state whether he proposes to take any, and, if so, what action in the matter.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Sir WILLIAM ANSON, Oxford University): This matter is plainly one as to which managers, if they are aggrieved by the action of the local education authority, have an appeal to the Board of Education, under Section 7 (3) of the Education

Act of 1902. Under these circumstances, the hon. Member will see that I could not without impropriety answer his Question within the terms in which it is framed.

*Mr. BOLAND: May I ask whether, as a matter of fact, an appeal has been lodged in this case.

Sir WILLIAM ANSON: I am not sure whether any appeal has been lodged in this case, but it has been done in similar cases.

Delay in Granting Probates in Dublin.

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland if he can explain the cause of the delay in the granting of probates at the principal registry of the probate division in Dublin.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): I am not aware that there is any delay. There are no arrears, and I am informed that yesterday the clerks in the office were engaged in drawing up the grants on applications lodged the same day. If the hon. Member will furnish me with information as to any particular case in which delay is alleged to have occurred, I will inquire into it.

Irish Land Purchase—Kenmare Estate.

Mr. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Estates Commissioners and the Congested Districts Board have been written to by tenants on the Kenmare Estate, county Kerry, intimating that the landlord had expressed his readiness to sell his estate, and asking them to open up negotiations for the purchase of same; and, if so, will he say whether it has been and will continue to be the practice of the Estates Commissioners and the Congested Districts Board not to take any steps in such circumstances until the landlord communicates directly with them.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Wyndham, Dover): The Congested Districts Board has received no communication from the tenants. The Estates Commissioners have, and the tenants were informed that no application for sale had been received from the owner. I do not know what the hon. Member means by "any steps." Neither the Board nor the Commissioners can take any effective administrative steps in respect of purchase until an owner has, at any rate, commenced overtures for sale.

Mr. MURPHY: I may inform the right hon. Gentleman that in this case the landlord is willing to sell and the tenants are willing to buy. I want to know if either of these Boards will now move in the matter.

Mr. WYNDHAM said it was for the parties to take the first step.

Children's Courts in Ireland.

Mr. HUGH LAW (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what arrangements have yet been made for the establishment of children's Courts in Dublin, Cork, and Belfast respectively; and when the Courts will be opened for the trial of child prisoners.

Mr. WYNDHAM: In Dublin and Belfast arrangements have already been made for the separate hearing of juvenile custody cases without bringing them into contact with adult offenders. In Cork, similar arrangements will be made when the by-laws regulating street trading by children are confirmed. These by-laws are now before the Lord-Lieutenant.

Mr. SLOAN: When will the Belfast Court be opened?

Mr. WYNDHAM: It is already open.

Carnane Estate, County Limerick.

Mr. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that within the past few months some sixty labourers and farmers in the parish of Fedamore, county Limerick, petitioned the Estates Commissioners requesting them to buy the Carnane Estate in that parish, and resell it in small lots to the labourers and small farmers around; and whether, seeing that the districts adjacent, Skule and Clodhadoloorte, are, for the most part, cut-out bog, and are highly congested, he can hold forth any hope to the parties interested that the Estates Commissioners will endeavour to buy this estate.

MR. WYNDHAM: There is some difficulty in identifying this estate on the information given in the Question. Perhaps the hon. Member will amend it by inserting the name of the owner.

Kinvara Pier and Harbour.

MR. JOYCE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the condition of the pier and harbour of Kinvara, county Galway; and whether, seeing that the county council are prepared to advance a certain amount of money towards the work, he will try to have the promises made by the Lord-Lieutenant and the Congested Districts Board, and also the sum promised under the Marine Works Act, fulfilled, so that this work may be taken in hand as soon as possible.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am aware of the condition of the harbour works at Kinvara. There are certain legal matters connected with the proposed expenditure on the works that are engaging the consideration of the Government, and I hope a decision will soon be arrived at.

MR. JOYCE: It is badly wanted.

Major Fox's Estate—Ballymacrossin, King's County.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the estate of Major Fox, Ballymacrossin, King's county, is being sold to the tenants, and that Miss Masterson (who is living in a wooden hut in the locality) was evicted out of a farm of 200 acres on the property in 1884; and whether he can state what provision is being made for the restoration of this evicted tenant to her holding.

MR. WYNDHAM: The estate of Major Fox is before the Estates Commissioners. They have also received an application from the evicted tenant named, which will be duly considered.

MR. DELANY: When will the result be known?

MR. WYNDHAM: I cannot forecast that.

Land Purchase in Tipperary—Thomas Dowling's Estate.

MR. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Daniel Moran, of Cappawhite, county Tipperary, a tenant on the estate of Thomas Dowling, which is in the Land Judge's Court for sale, offered twenty years purchase of his rent for his holding, which consists of a farm of about ten acres, of which he is a judicial tenant, and the same number of years purchase for his house and premises in Cappawhite, of which he is a yearly tenant; that his offer has been refused, and proceedings threatened by writ for the recovery of arrears of rent; and that it is proposedto sell the agricultural portion of the estate to the tenants, and the portion forming the village of Cappawhite to the incumbrancer; and, if so, whether the Estates Commissioners will, seeing that the tenants in the village live chiefly by farming the agricultural portion of their holdings, refuse their sanction to the proposed sale until an offer of sale is made of the whole estate to the tenants.

MR. KENDAL O'BRIEN: I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the proceedings in the Land Judge's Court in the matter of the estate of Thomas Dowling, and to the order made by the Judge on the application of the solicitor having carriage, whereby the offer of the agricultural tenants to purchase their holdings at twenty-and-a-half years purchase was accepted, and the request that had been issued to the Estates Commissioners to inspect the whole estate (part being held by agricultural tenants and part consisting of the village of Cappawhite) was ordered to be withdrawn, on the ground that the incumbrancer represented by the solicitor having carriage of the sale was disposed to purchase the village himself; and whether, in view of the fact that the greater number of the tenants in the village are also tenants on the agricultural portion of the estate, and of the effect upon these tenants of the withdrawal of the whole estate from the jurisdiction of the Estates Commissioners and splitting up the same for sale, the Estates Commissioners will, on the application of the tenants of the village of Cappawhite, order an inspection of it, with a view to its purchase and resale to the tenants.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Estates Commissioners understand that the Dowling Estate, for sale in the Land Judge's Court, consists partly of agricultural holdings and partly of the village of Cappawhite. They also understand that all the agricultural tenants, except Daniel Moran, have agreed to purchase their holdings on terms which the solicitor having carriage is prepared to recommend for acceptance to the Land Judge. Under these circumstances the Estates Commissioners considered that there was nothing to be gained by the issue of a request which could apply only to the village of Cappawhite, and accordingly withdrew the request.

Drainage of the Owenmore.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any portion of the Development Grant Fund will be allocated for river drainage purposes in Ireland; and, if so, whether a small grant from that fund will be given for the drainage of the Owenmore.

MR. WYNDHAM: Provision is made in the Development Grant Estimate for a charge in respect of the drainage of the Bann, the reasons for which I have explained. I am not prepared to impose on the Estimate any additional charge for the purposes of arterial drainage.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information as to the Estimate.

MR. WYNDHAM: It is being prepared.

Irish Schoolhouse Plans.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause of the delay on the part of the Government in sanctioning the revised plans and estimates for schoolhouses in Ireland; and if, considering the loss entailed for primary education by reason of this delay, he will take steps to have the plans approved of forthwith.

MR. WYNDHAM: The reasons for the delay have been explained by my hon. friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. I would refer to his statement on the 26th May last year.†

Police Constable Molloy, Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the district inspector has any explanation to offer of the fact that he did not report the conduct of Police Constable Molloy, as disclosed at the Coleraine Petty Sessions, until after the matter had been raised in this House; and whether he can state why Molloy was not censured immediately after he had threatened one of the witnesses.

MR. WYNDHAM: The constable, as I have already stated, used no threat towards the witness, and the district inspector considered it unnecessary, therefore, to make a report of the occurrence.

MR. MACVEAGH: When the report was made why did not the inspector act on it.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am not prepared to deal in detail with minor questions of discipline, as I have the greatest confidence in the Inspector-General.

Valentia Ferry.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that improved facilities for the ferry at Valentia, county Kerry, are urgently required, and of the forecast of expenditure under the Marine Works Act which was made with regard to it, he will state in what respect conditions have so changed that no scheme of improvement is now being pushed forward.

† See (4) Debates, cxxii., 1791.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am afraid I have no further information to give in the matter beyond that already supplied by me in answer to previous Questions† by the hon. Member.

United States Duties on Irish Fish.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has any, and if so what, official information as to the withdrawal by the United States Government of the increased duty on imported Irish mackerel.

MR. WYNDHAM: I gave this information in reply to a Question yesterday by the hon. Member for West Kerry.‡

Land Purchase in County Donegal—Case of George Ward.

MR. HUGH LAW: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state why the Congested Districts Board decided not to purchase the estate on which the holding from which George Ward, of Tuberkeen, Dungloe, county Donegal, was evicted is situated.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Board failed to come to terms with the owner.

MR. HUGH LAW: Are there any means of getting this man reinstated.

MR. WYNDHAM: I can only refer the hon. Member to my statements on this point last year in the Land Bill debates.

Kingston Estate, County Cork.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that police constables have been and are daily engaged visiting the homes of tenants on the Kingston Estate, inquiring whether the tenants have agreed to purchase, if they are pleased with the terms, and the acreage, rent, and valuation of their farms, a note of the answers being taken down in writing; that they have also visited the estate office to ascertain the number and names of the tenants who have signed agreements, and of those tenants who have refused to do so; and, if so, if he will state whether the police are acting under instructions by thus interfering in the negotiations and by exercising pressure on the tenants with a view of inducing acceptance of the agent's terms.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member has not been accurately informed. It is true that the police made inquiries in a friendly manner of the character referred to, but all such inquiries were made from tenants who had actually signed agreements for the purchase of their holdings and after negotiations had closed. The police did not interfere with these negotiations, nor did they exercise any pressure on tenants as suggested. As the hon. Member is aware, there have been many demands for statistical information in respect of sales under the Act of 1903, and the returns prepared by the police have facilitated the work of meeting these demands.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Does the right hon. Gentleman really think, with his knowledge of Ireland, that the police are the proper people to collect this information?

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes. I think they are; and when I am asked to obtain information I must do my best to get it. The police sometimes afford the only means.

MR. CULLINAN (Tipperary, S.): But is not the information thus collected always coloured in accordance with the views of the Government?

MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir.

Miltown-Malbay Petty Sessions Clerk.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will say whether, when Head Constable Allingham was recently elected petty sessions clerk at Miltown-Malbay, some of the magistrates of the district, including the chairman of the county council, who holds the Commission of the Peace, were not summoned to attend; and whether some of the magistrates who did attend, and voted for Head Constable

‡ See page 794.

Allingham, were not entitled to sit on the Miltown-Malbay Bench on the occasion; and, if so, whether he will cause another election to be held, and have all the duly qualified magistrates of the petty sessions district summoned.

MR. WYNDHAM: Notices were sent by the clerk of the peace to every magistrate returned to him by the acting clerk of petty sessions as resident or in the habit of attending Miltown Petty Sessions. The chairman of the county council is not resident in the district. Some of the votes recorded at the election were not valid, but these were disregarded, and the head constable was found to have a majority of valid votes. The necessity for a fresh election does not, therefore, arise.

Tallow Police Force.

MR. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Sunday, the 19th ult., the sergeant, Royal Irish Constabulary, at Tallow, county Waterford, requisitioned extra police from other stations; if so, will he state on what authority this was done, and why; whether anything in the nature of a public meeting was announced for or took place in Tallow or its neighbourhood on the occasion; and whether the county council of Waterford will be called upon to pay any part of the expense caused on the date mentioned by the action of this policeman.

MR. WYNDHAM: Four additional police arrived in Tallow on the date mentioned. They were ordered by the county inspector. No meeting was announced to be held and none was held. The men were drafted in from other stations in the county; the reply to the last query is consequently in the negative.

Labourers' Cottage Schemes in Ireland.

MR. O'SHEE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to how many estates inquiries have been made under Section 96 of the Land Act of 1903 with respect to accommodation for labourers; how many schemes have been framed, or are about to be framed, by the Land Commission providing therefor; how many of such schemes have been forwarded to the Local Government Board and the rural district councils; what are the names of the estates and the counties dealt with in such schemes; and whether the Estates Commissioners will consider the desirability of having inquiries made from the labourers themselves, as well as from other persons on each estate inspected.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am not yet in a position to reply to this Question; but I will communicate the information to the hon. Member in the course of an hour, and the reply will be printed on to-day's Votes.

Alleged Valuation Error at Dingle.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the holding of Thomas O'Donnell, Annascaul, Dingle, was valued at £5 beyond its true value through the mistake of the valuer; that he never knew of the increased valuation till he was asked to pay rates on it, when he refused and appealed to the county council; that there was no division or applotment in 1904, but a revision correcting the mistake of the valuer; whether, seeing that Mr. O'Donnell appealed on the first occasion this matter was brought to his notice, steps will be taken to have the amount which he was compelled unjustly to pay refunded to him.

MR. WYNDHAM: I explained the facts of this case in my reply to the hon. Member's previous Question of Monday last.† Public notice, in accordance with the statutory requirement, was given by the local authorities that the valuation lists were open for inspection. It is well known that such lists are open for inspection every year in March. Mr. O'Donnell failed to avail himself of his right of appeal, and there is no power now to re-open the case. It does not rest with the Government to order a refund in respect of rates; that is a matter for the local rating authority.

† See page 452.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: As this mistake was due to the neglect of an official, will the right hon. Gentleman see that the money is refunded?

Mr. WYNDHAM. I can add nothing to my Answer.

Millstreet Police Lodging-out Allowances.

Mr. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether Constable Ahern occupies that portion of the Millstreet police barrack known as the hospital; does his wife live in these apartments with him; is he one of the constables stated to be in receipt of a lodging-out allowance; and will he give the names of the two constables who live in the barrack and who are in receipt of lodging allowances.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The reply to the first two queries is in the affirmative, and to the third in the negative. The names of the two men referred to at the end of the Question are, Sergeant Crowley and Constable Smyth; the former has recently retired from the force.

Mr. SHEEHAN: Am I to understand that it is in accordance with the rules for a constable living in barracks with his wife to receive a lodging allowance?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I have said he does not.

Land Purchase in County Cavan—David Finlay's Estate.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Land Commission has been notified by tenant purchasers on the estate of David Finlay and others, near Bawnboy, in the county of Cavan, that the receivable orders which have been sent from its offices in Dublin have not been delivered to the tenants; and, if so, will he say who is responsible for their non-delivery.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a number of the tenants on the estate of David Finlay and others, near Bawnboy, in the county of Cavan (which is under the control of the Land Judge's Court), who have signed their purchase agreements, have been notified by the Irish Land Commission that their applications to purchase their holdings have been dismissed owing to delay; if so, will he state the cause of the delay; and, if the delay does not rest with the tenants, will they still be afforded an opportunity of completing their purchases.

Mr. WYNDHAM: On the 10th June thirteen applications for advances from tenants on this estate were dismissed by Mr. Commissioner O'Brien for delay in the conduct of the proceedings. The orders of dismissal have since been rescinded in six of these cases; five of which have been referred to the inspector for report and in the remaining case the advance has been sanctioned. No interest in lieu of rent is yet payable to the Land Commission in any of these cases, and consequently no receivable orders have been issued to the tenants. With respect to the seven cases in which the orders of dismissal have not been rescinded, the receiver has made a report to the Land Judge, who is in communication with the tenants' solicitor with a view to arranging, if possible, that they shall sign fresh applications, and also that all the remaining tenants shall also sign like applications for advance.

Learners in the Irish Postal Service.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether the rule reducing the age limit from twenty-five to eighteen years in the case of girls seeking to enter the Post Office service in Ireland is intended to apply to learners who have almost completed the twelve months probation, and who, at the date of the making of the rule, were only a few months over the age limit; and whether, in view of the loss of time this rule will inflict on these girls and their parents, he will take steps to except such cases from the operation of the rule.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Lord Stanley, Lancashire, Westhoughton): The maximum limit of age for admission as learners in the Post Office has been eighteen for some years, and this limit is retained in connection with the new arrangements for filling such situations generally by competition in Ireland. As in the past, assistants at sub-post offices will be eligible to take part in the limited competitions at Belfast, Cork, Dublin, Limerick, Londonderry, and Waterford, provided they have been continuously employed by the Post Office from a time when they were under twenty-five years of age.

Punishments in the Cork Post Office.

*MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware of the disparity in the punishments administered in the Cork Post Office; that for a mis-sent letter report, an officer was recently punished with two hours extra duty without pay; whilst for the loss of a remittance letter containing money, afterwards accidentally found, only nominal notice was taken; that for mis-sending two letters, a caution, in the surveyor's name, was recorded against an officer, and the same notice only was taken of a sorting clerk absent from duty for one day; that for an error of 1s. odd in the cast of a parcel list a sorting clerk was fined one day's pay, and cautioned in the Postmaster-General's name, whilst for an error of £10 in the preparation of a surcharge return on the part of another officer, no notice was taken; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of an investigation into the state of affairs at Cork Post Office by a trustworthy officer.

LORD STANLEY: I am not aware of the circumstances to which the hon. Member refers, but, with the exception of the caution in my name, all the punishments awarded were within the power of the local authorities to administer. They doubtless, in each case, took into consideration any special circumstances. I may add that in such cases I am unwilling to in any way interfere with the decisions of the local authorities, in whose fairness I have complete confidence.

*MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: Is the noble Lord aware that the system of espionage prevalent in the Cork Post Office is very irritating and causes a great deal of trouble?

LORD STANLEY: I am not aware of that, nor do I think it is so.

*MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: Will the noble Lord investigate the matter?

LORD STANLEY: No, Sir.

Kinvara (Galway) Letter Deliveries.

MR. JOYCE: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the fact that there is only one mail delivery at 7 a.m. at Kinvara, county Galway; and whether, seeing the inconvenience to traders and others that this causes, he will have arrangements made for an evening delivery also.

LORD STANLEY: The question of affording a second delivery of letters at Kinvara, county Galway, has recently been under consideration, but I regret that, owing to the high cost of the existing arrangements, I should not be justified in sanctioning the additional expense which would be involved in providing the desired accomodation.

Pay of Limerick Postmen.

MR. JOYCE: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the fact that the postmen employed at Limerick are not placed on an equal footing as regards pay with the postmen of other places where the work is the same; and, if so, will he give his attention to the matter, with a view of removing the alleged grievance.

LORD STANLEY: Postmen's wages are regulated mainly by the cost of living and value of labour in the locality. The pay of the Limerick postmen is the same as at other places where the conditions are similar.

MR. JOYCE: Arising out of that Answer, may I tell the noble Lord that the cost of living in Limerick is as high—especially in the matter of house rent—as in Cork. Will he consider this very real grievance?

[No Answer was returned.]

Trinity College, Dublin.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will give the Return asked for in the Order Paper this day relating to the revenues and method of government and administration of Trinity College, Dublin.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have looked into this matter, and I find that in part the information asked for is to be found in the College Calendar published each year under the authority of the Board. Other information can be collected from the Report of the Royal Commission of 1853, and from two Returns, one of June 10th, 1874 (Incomes and Revenues) for each year (1869–1873), and from another Return of August 5th of 1889 (Incomes and Revenues). The revenues of the college, which, apart from fees, are mainly derived from land held by the college, are at present the subject of a reference to a Vice-regal Commission, which has just been appointed. Having regard to the information available from the sources indicated, it would appear that no useful object would be attained by granting the Return, which would entail very considerable expense, as it would necessitate practically the preparation of a volume of great length dealing with the whole question of University administration. I do not think I could with propriety ask the University authorities to furnish this material, as they have no staff or funds available for the purpose.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that since the last Report, issued in 1899, Trinity College had obtained something like £15,000 a year extra of public money.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR imagined that, if that were so, it must have been either for fees or land, and if it was for land it would be the subject of inquiry by the Vice-regal Commission, whose Report, no doubt, would be made public.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is within his knowledge that a Return with regard to revenues was given for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge some time ago, and that no difficulty was raised by the authorities, and whether, if a good deal of the information asked for can be abstracted from the different Returns to which he has referred, it would be so difficult and costly to put it in a form which would be convenient to Members of the House and to others interested in Irish education. This is a matter of great interest not only to the people of Ireland, and it is almost impossible at present, except by very laborious investigation of these documents, to get even the elementary facts of the case.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I speak with very imperfect knowledge of the subject, but I conceive there would not be a serious difficulty in collating the information already available to the public. But that information would hardly be complete enough for the subject of a Parliamentary Return if, as I understand the case, there are other parts of the question in regard to which the difficulty I have referred to would make itself felt. I cannot add to what I have already said. I am told that it would be a costly and difficult thing, and in that case, and considering that there is a Commission investigating it, it seems premature, at all events, to ask the college to undertake this costly operation.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: But is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Return for which I am asking is framed exactly on the one granted for Oxford and Cambridge.

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman has said he cannot give the Return. The hon. Member cannot debate that Answer.

The Return referred to was as follows—

Trinity College, Dublin—Return of Revenues and Statement of method of government and administration, in the following form:—

(a) A Statement of the Revenues of the College, and of the sources from which they are derived.

(b) As to the Fellows of the College—

Their number; method of election; tenure of office; the duties and emoluments of each individual Fellow, and the sources from which these emoluments are derived; how many, and which of them, hold professorships or other offices.

(c) As to the Professors—

Their number; method of election; tenure of office; the duties and emoluments of each Professor; whence are those emoluments derived; how many, and which of them, hold other collegiate offices.

(d) A Statement of the method of government and administration of the College (distinguishing the duties of the Board and of the Academic Council), and of the number, duties, and salaries of the persons, other than servants, porters, etc., employed in the College.

(e) A Statement giving particulars as to the four professional schools, showing—

(1) The number of Professors and Teachers in each school.

(2) The emoluments received by each such Professor and Teacher.

(3) The fees paid in each school for professional instruction.

(f) A Statement giving particulars of the amount and employment of the Fund received as compensation for the Church livings of which the College was deprived in 1869, showing—

(1) The original amount of the Fund.

(2) The method of investment.

(3) The employment of the interest of the Fund.

(4) The present amount of the Fund.

(g) What provision is made for pensioning Fellows and Professors and other persons in the employment of the College. How many pensions have been granted since 1870. Age, employment, and cause of retirement of persons to whom such pensions have been granted. How many of such persons are now living.

Behring Sea Seal Fisheries—Despatch of a British Warship.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if His Majesty's Government have undertaken to send a British man-of-war to protect, against attack, the Russian possessions in the Pribyloff Islands, the Copper Islands, or other islands in the Behring Sea, or Russian property in seals on or about those islands; have they arranged with the Russian Government that this man-of-war shall coal at Petropavlovsk; if so, seeing that Russia is at war with Japan, and that Japan is consequently free to exercise her right of attacking, capturing, and confiscating any Russian territory or property, on what ground was the decision taken to intervene in the war by protecting Russian possessions or property against Japanese attacks; have His Majesty's Government taken the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, and are they satisfied by that advice that such action does not constitute a breach of neutrality.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg also to ask the First Lord of the Treasury were conferences held at the Foreign Office in March and April as to the proposed defence of certain Russian islands and seal fisheries in the Behring Sea, between British, Canadian, and Russian delegates; if so, was any Japanese delegate present or invited to be present at those conferences; and, if not, why not; have His Majesty's Government applied for the assent of Japan to the interference of Great Britain for the defence of Russian territory and property against Japanese attacks; and, if so, when was their assent asked for and given; and, in view of the precedent thus to be set of action by a neutral Power, in derogation of the rights of war recognised by the Law of Nations, will the correspondence with Russia and Japan respectively, and an account of the conferences be laid upon the Table

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am quite ready to answer my hon. friend to-day on these two Questions; but would not his purpose be sufficiently satisfied if I were to assure him that any steps we have taken have been taken with the full knowledge and assent both of Russia and Japan, and that no international question can arise? If he wishes for more detailed information I will give it now.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: No, Sir; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can promise me the correspondence I have asked for. It does raise an intensely important question of international law, and if we could have the correspondence regarding that important question, that would entirely satisfy me.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think there is any correspondence upon the point in which the hon. Member is chiefly interested. I think he has asked these Questions under a mistake, but I will give him a full Answer. The first Question relates to certain islands. He is under a mistake in thinking that the Pribyloff Islands belong to Russia. As a matter of fact they belong to the United States. One of His Majesty's ships is about to proceed, as usual, to the Commander Islands, to enforce, under the Seal Fishery Act, 1893, so far as British vessels are concerned, the provisions of the agreement with Russia. This agreement was laid before Parliament in 1893. His Majesty's ship, as in former years, will be furnished with a supply of coal at Petropavlovsk. No jurisdiction will be exercised by His Majesty's ship over Japanese vessels, but the Japanese Government have requested that any raid may be reported to them and they will themselves deal with such case. No breach of neutrality can take place, and there has been no occasion to consult the Law Officers of the Crown. The action of His Majesty's Government has been taken at the request of Russia and Japan.

Sir Charles Eliot's Resignation—Conditions of Grant of Land to East African Syndicate.

Mr. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will lay upon the Table of the House, either before or at the same time as the Papers connected with Sir Charles Eliot's resignation, the conditions on which 320 square miles of country has been granted or leased to the East African Syndicate; and what consideration the said syndicate has paid or has agreed to pay for same.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The Papers will be laid simultaneously.

The Statement on Army Reform.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In reply to my Question yesterday the First Lord of the Treasury said he could not say what the business on Thursday next would be. But the newspapers appear to have been informed that the Army Estimates will be taken and that the Secretary of State for War will then make his statement. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is now able to inform the House upon this subject.

Mr. WOLFF: And will the right hon. Gentleman make a statement at the same time as to the arrangement for Friday's business?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the statement to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, but it has certainly not been made on the authority of His Majesty's Government. I think it not improbable that my right hon. friend will be able to make his statement on Thursday, but I must certainly not be held as committing myself at present to that arrangement of business. In reply to the hon. Member for Belfast the arrangement will be as I hinted yesterday. We shall take first the order of reference of the Labourers Bill to a Standing Committee. I hope that will not take long, so that we may then go on to the Land Bill.

The Aliens Bill.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Minister in charge of the Aliens Bill took steps in the Grand Committee that day which practically amounted to its abandonment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have been informed that a Resolution was passed that in consequence, as I understand it, of the extraordinary prolongation of the proceedings in that Committee——

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): No such Resolution was passed.

Mr. WALLACE (Perth): It was withdrawn absolutely by the Minister.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I was asked the Question without notice, and I attempted to answer it with such information as I had. If that information is disputed, hon. Gentlemen had better put down a Question.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Does not the Minister in charge of the Bill act on the instructions of the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Minister in charge of the Bill is a member of the Cabinet, but so far as I know he acted in this respect as a member of Committee. But, again, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will put a Question down.

MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.): I am sure the right hon. Gentleman on consideration will see that at the earliest moment practicable, at this period of the session, the House should be informed what the position of the Aliens Bill is.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is three o'clock.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I desire to ask, Sir, whether the Chairman of the Aliens Bill Committee has not reported to the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Mr. Swift MacNeill's "Orderly" Question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL asked why a Question he had handed in at the Table, and which was perfectly in order, it having reference to the Motion on the Paper with regard to the dissolution of the present Parliament, had not appeared on the Paper.

*MR. SPEAKER: I have not the least idea, but I am delighted to hear that the hon. Member has succeeded in bringing to the Table a perfectly orderly Question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I can only say that in my own judgment it was orderly. But I hope Mr. Speaker will make inquiry, because the blue pencil is exercised most delightfully on my Questions.

The Public in the Central Hall,

MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington): I beg to ask Mr. Speaker whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that an apparently organised crowd was gathered in the Central Hall on Monday evening, and that so as to preserve order the police moved part of the crowd into Old Palace-yard, and whether there is any rule or order of the House which limits the number of strangers to be allowed within the precincts of the House when it is sitting.

*MR. SPEAKER: The only regulation of the House I am aware of is that contained in one of the Sessional Orders, which directs the Commissioners of the Police and the Sergeant-at-Arms to see that there is no disorder and no annoyance within the precincts of the House. As to what took place on Monday, I knew nothing at the time of there being any great crowd, but I was afterwards informed that there had been a considerable crowd in the central lobby. I made some inquiry and learned from the Sergeant-at-Arms and from the inspector of police that although there was a considerable crowd, and some noise, the passages were kept open and that there was nothing in the circumstances which appeared to make it necessary to report to me that there was disorder or annoyance or to take any steps. The only step that was taken, I understand, was that when the inspector of police found that the number of people in the central lobby was becoming very large, the police at the western entrance to St. Stephen's Hall were instructed not to allow more to come in until there was room, and those who were there were directed to retire, and they did retire.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Do we understand that hon. Members on the other side are afraid of meeting their constituents?

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS.

The Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of the Chairman of Ways and Means.

ALIENS BILL.

Reported, so far as amended, in the Standing Committee on Law, etc.

Leave given to the Standing Committee to make a Special Report.

Special Report brought up, and read.

Lawrence, Mr. Stock, Sir John Willox, Mr. Charles McArthur, Mr. David MacIver, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Houston, and Mr. Watson Rutherford; to be read a second time upon Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 259.]

SUPPLY [16TH ALLOTTED DAY.]

(In the Committee.)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1904-5.

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £71,342, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1905, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Irish Land Commission."

*MR. CULLINAN (Tipperary, S.) moved to reduce the Vote by £1,000 in order to call attention to the working of the Land Act of last year. During the passage of the Act, he said, they were told that they were going to have a new Ireland, that industries were to be revived, and that, in fact, immigration was to be substituted for emigration. But, instead, they had a feeling of dissatisfaction and discontent owing to the way in which the Act was working. They were promised a great electrical boom in the establishment of the Iveagh-Pirrie Motor Scheme, but before the end of the year they learned that the scheme had been, if he might say so, actually dead before it was born, and, instead of a spirit of confidence having been created throughout the country, dissatisfaction and discontent were rampant owing to the way in which the Land Act was being worked. It could not be denied that hon. Members representing the tenant farmers acted in a straightforward and conciliatory manner, being ready to meet the landlord party more than halfway. They were prepared to put up with great defects in the Bill in order to give every possible chance for the realisation of the prophecy of the supporters of the Bill, and in order to give every opportunity of testing the sincerity of the landlords and their friends. It must be admitted that their National organisation in Ireland had not up to the present taken any precipitate action whatever, notwithstanding that the landlords had completely spurned the conciliatory policy; on the contrary, the farmers had shown the greatest possible forbearance. What was the result? The landlords, instead of accepting the bonus in the spirit in which it was intended, viz., in order to bridge over the difference between them and the tenants, had increased their demands, exclusive of the bonus, by six, eight, and ten years purchase. In some cases they had demanded almost double the former value of their properties. He knew of one case in which the landlord, prior to the passing of the Act, was willing to sell to his tenants at nineteen years purchase, whereas he was now demanding twenty-six-and-a-half years, which, with the bonus, represented thirty years purchase.

The Land Commissioners were giving dissatisfaction equally to landlords and tenants. They had no regular system; they lacked cohesion and they were incapable. He knew of one who was actually unable to distinguish between a wheat and an oats crop in the end of July and was appointed Land Commissioner the following November. He believed he was appointed a Commissioner solely because he was a captain of Militia. Any Land Commissioner who happened to be a practical man was hunted about from pillar to post. In his opinion, the money at present devoted to the carrying on of the work of the Land Commissioners was really wasted; and he pointed to the remarkable fact that there was scarcely any difference in the rents, whether fixed in the Land Commissioners' Court, the County Court, or through the aid of valuers. It could really, he declared, only be described as the penny-in-the-slot system. It was quite a waste of time and money for landlords and tenants to go into these Courts; the thing had become a regular farce, for, whatever evidence was given and whatever inspections followed, it did not alter the thing one iota. The decisions were all arranged beforehand. Incidentally he spoke of Land Commissioners' driving round on their visits of inspection with land agents; and, turning to statistics, he showed that in return for the £180,000 paid to the Land Commission for the years 1902 and 1903 they had only a few estates sold and a gross reduction of rents of £49,637. This, he declared, was an extraordinary state of things, requiring most serious consideration.

With regard to the Land Purchase Act of last year, he thought the first question that would occur to the Irish Members would be what answer the Chief Secretary could give to the complete indifference and neglect shown to the evicted tenants in Ireland. Last year the most positive assurances were given by the Chief Secretary that the question of the evicted tenants would be attended to, and that it was the desire of the Government that the evicted tenants question should be satisfactorily and speedily settled. What had happened since? In the Return furnished they found that up to 30th April forty-one evicted tenants had been reinstated by their landlords and twenty-four only had been reinstated by the Estates Commissioners, whilst the enormous sum of £2,252 had been handed over by way of grants. The Chief Secretary had said that owing to the uncertainty of the bonus with regard to the sale of untenanted land there had been delay, but, if that were so, why did he not get his amending Bill passed? He wished to draw attention to the Land Judge's Court in Ireland. The tenants on the Westropp Estate in the county of Clare approached the Estates Commissioners with a request that they should buy up the estate. The matter was brought by the receiver's solicitor before the Land Judge's Court, and when it was explained to the Land Judge that the tenants were in negotiation with the Estates Commissioners, he declared that he would not allow this thing to go on, and that the tenants were mistaken if they thought they could go behind his back; and to punish them he put back their cases for a period of twelve months. He wished to know what the Chief Secretary and the Attorney-General had to say in defence of this attitude of the Land Judge. He desired also to know what was the explanation of the increased prices of land to-day in the Land Judge's Court. How was it they had orders sent out that tenants must pay twenty-four and twenty-four-and-a-half years purchase when the average for the preceding year was much lower? He wanted to know what the Estates Commissioners would do in cases where the landlords had offered to sell at reasonable prices of seventeen, eighteen, and nineteen years purchase before the passing of the Act, and had now increased their price to twenty-four-and-a-half years purchase. This was a question of very great importance. What would the Estates Commissioners do in the case where a landlord was willing three or four years ago to sell to the tenants at twenty-two-and-a-half years purchase, and was only prevented doing so, because the Commissioners refused to sanction the advance. Now that landlord was demanding twenty-four-and-a-half years, and again he asked what the Estates Commissioners would do in that case?

When a landlord in the West of Ireland desired to effect a sale, instead of allowing the tenant to go into Court for the second-term rent, he held out the bribe of an abatement of 5 or 10 per cent., in order to get the tenant to sign second-term judicial agreements, notwithstanding that the reduction must be seventeen, eighteen, or twenty per cent., and he would claim that he was within the zone of twenty-four-and-a-half years purchase, besides tacking on a year or two of the arrears. The complaint they had to make was that up to the present they saw the prices of land going up, and, as was prophesied by the hon. Member for East Mayo at the time of the passage of the Bill, all the coercion, intimidation, and obstruction was on the side of the landlords. What steps were the Estates Commissioners taking to safeguard the interests of the tenants? He thought they were perfectly justified in raising this matter. There was no doubt that the zone system was being abused and it was being abused for the deliberate purpose of raising the price of land. The surprise to him was that under the circumstances the people of Ireland had shown so much patience. He felt convinced that the Chief Secretary was anxious that this Bill should work satisfactorily, and that the measure which he initiated should do something in the direction of settling the great agrarian trouble in Ireland. That was an ambition which any man would be proud to attain, but in his opinion the Chief Secretary was going the wrong way about it. All Chief Secretaries who entered the Dublin Castle ring came out of it discredited, and the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be giving too much latitude to the Dublin Castle party. If the Chief Secretary insisted upon Irish tenants paying unreasonable and exorbitant prices it would be the ruin of them and their families; he ought to put his foot down, and let the landlords see that they could not get this bonus tacked on to their exorbitant prices. If they wished the Land Act to bring the blessings to Ireland which had been anticipated, they would have to adopt another method and have the Act administered in a more reasonable and fair spirit. The purchasers ought to have some protection from the exorbitant and unreasonable demands made by the Irish landlords. He begged to move a reduction of this Vote by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £70,342, be granted for the said Service." — (Mr. Cullinan.)

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said the first comment he wished to make was the inconvenience the House was put to in having to discuss this Vote without the Report. The financial year of the Commission ended on the 31st of March, and if they desired any information for the purposes of this debate they had no means of getting it, and they were driven back upon the old Report of last year. That was a preposterous state of things and it was not fair to the House of Commons. It was not fair to any hon. Member who took an interest in the Irish land question to be compelled to go back to the year 1903 when he desired the figures for 1904. He was sure that the Chief Secretary would not deny that it was an extraordinary thing that they should be utterly bereft of the facts and figures of last year. The Chief Secretary ought to have insisted upon having the Report of that Commission before this Vote was discussed. It was not an extraordinary demand to make, and he pressed it now upon the Chief Secretary. It was quite natural that the interest in the land question should be turned from fair rents to purchase of late. He did not wonder at that, but it would be a mistake if Irish Members, in their anxiety to promote land purchase, should forget what was going on in the fair-rent Courts. There was one aspect of the question to which he desired to draw the attention of the Chief Secretary—he should like him to tell the House the number of fair-rent cases which had been heard and disposed of during the past year. At present they had no means of knowing, and he should like the right hon. Gentleman to give them the average number of reductions of first-term and second-term rents, and also the number of Commissioners actually engaged in fair-rent work. He understood that a very large number of Commissioners and Sub-commissioners had been removed from fair-rent work and placed upon work connected with the Estates Commission. When they knew the number of cases which had been settled they would be able to see whether they had got value for their money.

He wished to call the Chief Secretary's attention to the question of appeals, in regard to which he thought the Irish Party had a considerable grievance. On the 31st of March, 1902, there were 12,680 appeals outstanding, and on the 31st of March, 1903, there were 13,082. He did not know how many were outstanding the year before that. When he pointed out that many of these appeals had been pending for five or six years the Committee would at once see the hardship involved. In the case of county Monaghan the Appeal Court had not sat for eighteen months, and in that county there were more than 1,000 appeals outstanding. The system worked badly in more respects than one. In the first place these farmers who had had their rents unfixed for five or six years did not know what their actual rents were. That was not a fair position to put them in, and their rents ought to be fixed in a reasonable time. It was all important that the farmer should know what his rent was, in case the landlord proposed to sell, and he had no means of knowing that if his case was outstanding on appeal. The result was, in more cases than one, that he was wheedled into consenting to take the rent as it stood at present, or as it stood before, and he thus was induced to purchase on unfair terms. In addition to that it was not reasonable or fair that a farmer conducting his business should not know what his rent was. This delay worked badly for purchase and badly for the thrift of the farmer. It was absolute nonsense to say that an appeal on the question of fair rent should be pending five or six years. The Chief Secretary had tried his hand at improving matters and endeavouring to remedy the difficulty—he was not blaming him, but the system. He did not know the result of the new system of appeal. That was not fair. Why should a Member of Parliament be without this information? They were all interested in knowing how the new system worked. They had taken away one of the Appeal Judges from his work, and it was perfectly impossible that he should give the time to it he had done. He could not be in Dublin settling nice points of law that were arising every day in the Estates Commissioners' Department, and also in the country fixing fair rents. This was part of the new system. Then Mr. Commissioner Fitzgerald, who called himself a Judge, but was no more a Judge than he himself, was also an Appeal Judge. He should be glad to hear the result of Mr. Commissioner Fitzgerald's work, but the Committee would find that comparatively little had been done in the way of getting rid of the arrears of appeals.

He should like to make a suggestion to the Chief Secretary, though he doubted very much whether he would accept it. He would like to know what were the proceedings going on under the old Land Act of 1896. There were, let the Committee remember, two Land Commissioners derelict at the present moment. They had nothing to do; though Mr. Lynch drew something like £3,000, and Mr. Murrough O'Brien £2,500. Would the Chief Secretary tell him what was being done under the old Purchase Act of 1896, which these two gentlemen administered? If they could learn the number of estates sold under the old Act they would see what value they were getting for the £2,500 and the £3,000 paid to these gentlemen respectively. Why should not Mr. Murrough O'Brien and Mr. Stanislaus Lynch be sent out as Appeal Judges.

It would be an interesting experiment. If they were sent out together it was certain that fair rents would stand. Mr. Lynch would have one thought and Mr. O'Brien another; and the result would be the rent would stand, because they would never reach a conclusion. He thought substantial justice would be done in that case. At all events, let them know what value they got for the £5,500 out of the Irish Treasury—it was nonsense to talk about the English Treasury; it was the Irish Treasury—and if the Chief Secretary would not send them to appeal work let him find them some work they could do without doing mischief. It would not be easy, but let him try. He hoped the Chief Secretary would say what was the state of appeal business now. One strange thing he had been told was that the bulk of the appeals were not in counties like Antrim and Down, where there was excellent hotel accommodation. Living was rather pleasant there. The real difficulty was in counties like Monaghan [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: Fermanagh] — No they were better in Fermanagh. The bulk of the appeal work was in the outlying counties, where the appeal gentleman did not like to go and lodge, and where living was not so pleasant of an evening. This business of appeal had really become so serious that the Chief Secretary ought to try and do something to settle it. The present machinery was not sufficient. He ought to devise other machinery.

The next matter he came to was the Estates Commissioners. He had no fault to find with these gentlemen, or their work, but he wanted information. That was what they were entitled to, though they did not get much of it. For example, he wanted to know something about the staff, and in order that that information should be useful they must know something about the work. Up to 30th April they had a Return. They knew what had been done up to 30th April. He wanted to know how the figures stood now. In the first place, how many estates had been actually sold by the Estates Commissioners, and had the money been paid and the transactions closed? Then he should like to know what was the position of the work at the present moment—that was to say, in regard to how many estates were there applications, and what was the amount in money actually pending before the Estates Commissioners now? He should greatly like to know what the staff was—how many inspectors they had, because if the inspecting staff was not sufficient there would be interminable delay, to the great detriment both of the selling landlord and the purchasing tenant. He saw a representative of the Treasury present. He should like to say frankly that the Treasury was never too active in advancing aid for purposes like this in Ireland. He was not quite sure that the representatives of the Treasury at this moment were very anxious about the work at all, but he should like to say to the Chief Secretary that this was a matter which would not brook delay. If these applications were coming in at the rate currently reported, if there was a block at the present moment, as was currently reported, then it devolved upon him to see that the staff was sufficient to deal with that block and to have it removed. He knew that money was scarce. At all events, the representatives of Ireland had a right to insist on this. The Exchequer got £10,000,000 a year from Irish taxation, and the Government ran the country for £7,000,000. There was thus an Imperial contribution of £3,000,000. At all events, on the land question the Treasury could not only afford to spend money, but they ought to spend it. The House ought not to allow any excuse for this work being delayed in any shape or form, and as regarded clerks and inspectors, his opinion was that it was being delayed for lack of both.

Let him put another Qustion to the Chief Secretary in regard to purchase work. The Act provided for the purchase of estates by the Commissioners. He saw from the Dublin newspapers that some friction was already beginning between the Land Judge's Court and the Estates Commissioners. He saw that the Judge of the Land Judge's Court was developing a lofty idea of what his responsibilities and obligations were. Obligations to whom? He desired to know from the Chief Secretary to-night how many estates in the Land Judge's Court had been purchased by the Estates Commissioners. He did not believe there had been one where the purchase had been completed. He did know estates that were in progress. There was one in which he was personally interested. He supposed it would be finished some time next century. It had been in Court since 1882. It went in a perfectly solvent estate. It was now bankrupt, and nobody had made a penny out of it except the lawyers. There were negotiations pending between the Estates Commissioners and the Land Judge, and he wanted to know what length these negotiations had actually gone. How much money had been paid on that head? He wanted also some figures with reference to the Congested Districts Board. It would be interesting if the Chief Secretary could give a list of purchases so far as the Congested Districts Board was concerned. There was a section in the Act which authorised the Land Commission to negotiate directly with the landlords for the sale of their estates. He wanted to know how much negotiation had taken place under that head. How many landlords had called in the Estates Commissioners to fix the value of their land with the view to sales? All these figures would be intensely interesting if the Chief Secretary could oblige the Committee with them. He would be glad, for his own information, and for the information of the people of Ireland, if the Chief Secretary would give an account of what was going on in all these several Departments, and especially in regard to the working of appeals, for he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the farmers were exceedingly anxious on that point.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover) said he took the somewhat unusual course of rising early in the afternoon, not to make a set speech and not to preclude his right to speak again, but to answer a number of Questions which had been addressed to him by the hon. Members who had preceded him. He freely admitted that information in regard to a number of the matters referred to had only been brought down to the end of April in the Returns, and he agreed that it would be for the convenience of speakers who were to follow that he should give such further information as he could put at their disposal. Therefore, the principal part of what he would say would be in answer to definite Questions addressed to him. He might say at once that he welcomed from the hon. Member who spoke first his concluding remarks, namely, that he was convinced that he (the Chief Secretary) wished this Act to work well. That was so, and in his answer he trusted that he might be able to give some reason for believing that the Act was not working badly. But there must be grounds for disappointment. Within a year of the passing of such a measure he did not disguise that the question of staff was a very pertinent one. They could not have the old rent-fixing staff going on on its old establishment, and at the same moment improvise a new purchase staff adequate for work which was increasing from day to day and from month to month. Many points in connection with the problems arising out of the Act required a great deal of careful consideration on their administrative side. They often required a legal decision on some abtruse question of law, but on these grounds they had not lost hope, if after some nine months the progress made under this Act had not been so great as had been expected. He wished to answer some of the Questions addressed to him, and he would make a full and frank confession at the very start. His own attention, in common with the attention of most people interested in the Irish land question, had been concentrated in recent months rather upon the purchase side than the rent-fixing side of the question, and he was not prepared, as in an ordinary year he might have been, to give very full information on the number of rent-fixing cases that had been decided. He noticed the complaint of the hon. Member for South Tyrone that they had not the Report of the Land Commission. That complaint had often been made, but he would ask hon. Members to realise that this was a very voluminous and complex Report and that it had to furnish very varied and very minute information upon numbers of matters carried down to the 31st March. To collect the statistical material for that Report was, with good fortune, an operation of two months duration and sometimes more. Then it had to be digested and tabulated, and in the past it had never proved possible, as a matter of fact, to produce that Report before August. He had been urging the Land Commission on the subject and they were making their best endeavours to get the Report out at an earlier date, but it had not been possible to produce it before the 13th July. In response to very natural curiosity they had compiled reports dealing with statistics of the Land Purchase Acts brought down to the end of March of last year, and he had supplied other information. He agreed that it would be desirable that they should have the Report as soon as possible.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL asked whether the Report itself, which was only a few pages, and summarised the whole of the proceedings of the Department, could not have been issued at an earlier time.

Mr. WYNDHAM said that he might perhaps consider that for another occasion. Turning to the question of appeals he said he was glad to do so, because at the first blush the figures were on the face of them very discouraging; and it was only when they examined and analysed them, and when they considered that the provisions affecting appeals in the Act of last year had only recently come into operation, and when they made other discounts, that they were able to arrive at the conclusion which he urged, namely, that the provisions affecting appeals introduced into last year's Act were likely to work well. The hon. Member for South Tyrone had said that it was a very serious matter for Irish tenant occupiers at the present moment that their appeals should not be decided. The fact that they were not decided might lead them into making a worse bargain than they might otherwise conclude with their landlords. He did not think that contention was a very good one—[An Hon. Member: It is.] He would give his reasons. He was disposed rather to agree with the hon. Member for South Tipperary. He did not quite agree with the reasons the hon. Member gave; but he accepted his conclusion, which was that there was an enormous waste of time and money in respect of all this fair-rent litigation. He thought that was so; and, in particular, in respect of appeals the waste of time and money was altogether out of proportion to the results obtained from these appeals. Who was it who initiated these appeals?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: Both sides.

Mr. WYNDHAM said these appeals were initiated by the landlord in 80 per cent. of the cases. It was perfectly true that if they took a number of appeals they would find something more of an equality, but that was because the tenant entered a cross-appeal. Unless he did so the only possible result was that his rent would be raised. This had involved a great amount of waste of time and money, which was deplorable, and for the sake of 2s. 6d. or 5s. variation he doubted whether any tenant was well advised in waiting eighteen months or two years to have his appeal heard, if he could enter into a bargain for purchase which he thought reasonable and proper. At any rate, the reasons which urged him last year to invite the House to deal with the question of appeals were, that he felt that they constituted an abuse and placed an enormous and unnecessary tax on the agricultural community in Ireland. If he took the year to 30th June, 1903, the number of outstanding appeals was 13,252; and if he took the year to 30th June last there was not a diminution but an increase, the number being 13,700, an increase of 448. They must look at that matter a little bit more closely. Of course the provisions of the Act of last year could scarcely have been expected to operate effectively during the whole of the period which had elapsed since then; and if they turned, not so much to the numbers outstanding as to the numbers which had been lodged, they would find that the figures were of a more promising description. In the year to 30th June, 1903, 4,979 were lodged; in the year to 30th June last, 4,422. But let them take the six months to June last year and to June this year. In respect of the first period the number lodged was 2,816, and to the second 1,790, and let them take the three months up to these two dates, and they would find that last year the number lodged was 1,280 and this year 789.

MR. WYNDHAM said he was only giving the information asked for. With these figures before them there was a great deal of ground for saying that there was continuous progress, and that the provisions put into the Act of last year which were intended to discourage unnecessary litigation were having that effect. He had no doubt that it would be possible to operate upon that continuous diminution, and that they would, he hoped in no very long time, diminish the number of these outstanding appeals. But he frankly confessed to the Committee that it was not possible to start at a high establishment the work of furthering appeals, the work for fixing fair rents in the first instance, and the work for purchase. He did not think that could be done. He made no complaint, he need scarcely say, of the treatment which he had received at the hands of the Treasury during the year. But money had been very scarce. He thought it reasonable, in view of certain prophecies put forward soon after they passed the Act of last year to the effect that there was much cry and little wool, and that there would be no transactions, to show that the Act was working before claiming that a large staff of salaried officials, who were permanent civil servants and entitled to pensions, should be created. Supposing these ill-omened prophecies had proved true, they might have saddled the Estimates with £20,000 or £30,000 a year paid to gentlemen who would be doing very little. The original indoor staff on the purchase side embraced thirty-one persons with salaries amounting to £10,760 a year. Since then there had been added two assistant examiners, one first-class clerk, two second-class clerks, twelve second-division clerks, a managing clerk and twenty-two abstractors, while the amount of salaries had been increased to £13,770. The outdoor staff was also very important. At the beginning, before the estates came in, he was not in a position to claim that there should be a great number of inspectors sitting in Dublin when there was no call for their services to the country districts of Ireland. Originally in November arrangements were made for eleven inspectors, whose salaries amounted to £8,800 a year and two surveyors with salaries amounting to £240 a year, but he arranged in March last for six more inspectors and five temporary inspectors, temporary in the sense that their places would be taken in October by inspectors from the rent-fixing department, also for four assistant inspectors, and ten surveyors, so that at the present moment the salaries of officials engaged solely in purchase work amounted to £34,300 a year. He did not think that could be called a niggardly provision. Of course the staff would not have been increased unless he had been able to show that the work of land purchase was also increasing.

Again, at the outset, he frankly confessed that he had been personally disappointed at the little progress which they had succeeded in making in respect to two of the most important objects of the Act, namely, congestion and the reinstatement of evicted tenants. That was to him a matter of personal disappointment. He had been accused that afternoon of not having displayed sufficient energy in finding time for the stages of the amending Land Bill, but he would ask hon. Members, in whatever quarter of the House they sat, to cast their minds back over the last few weeks and months, and to say whether the opportunities for legislation had been very large; because he did not think in all his experience, with the possible exception of the year 1893, he recollected a year in which the obstacles to legislation had been so many and so large. It was his earnest desire to pass the Bill, and it was put down for Friday. It was clear that unless the bonus were attached to untenanted land it was all but impossible to make any practical advance in dealing with that question. There had been occasions when arrangements could be made upon this or that property, but unless the Estates Commissioners could have some land in their hands, so to speak, to play with they would not be able to deal with the question satisfactorily. His instructions to the Estates Commissioners had been that they should make a point of endeavouring to deal with the question of evicted tenants.

Mr. ROCHE (Galway, E.) asked whether they were to understand that untenanted land did not carry a bonus at present.

Mr. WYNDHAM said that it was a matter of some doubt after certain judicial observations. If a bonus were needed for tenanted land, it was needed still more for untenanted land, because the value of untenanted land was often greater than tenanted land. They did not, of course, wish that the tenants to whom they were going to sell untenanted land should pay higher annual instalments than those who were actually occupying land. They proposed to reinstate men who had not been farming for some years, and who were not overburdened with capital. It was idle to suppose that they would have a chance, or that the money of the taxpayer would be secured, unless they got such land upon such terms which would enable them to have some hope of success. The bonus was absolutely essential in the case of untenanted land. The Congested Districts Board had been able to buy a certain amount of untenanted land; but that had only been possible by his taking a great deal of responsibility upon himself, and promising that if Parliament did not pass the Bill he would take the money out of the Congested Districts Board's funds. The Estates Commissioners were not able to buy untenanted land in that way, because they had no funds. They were, of course, buying as cheaply as they could; but they did not think it wise to endeavour to force people, who came forward in good faith, to sell untenanted land which was a very valuable asset in Ireland. There seemed to be an idea in some quarters that extraordinary pressure was going to be used in order to force landlords to sell untenanted land. It was not desired to buy in any land at less than the market value, and they could well afford to purchase it at a fair price. The object he hoped to achieve by getting untenanted land was an object for which money could be well devoted. The Estates Commissioners had been able to deal with evicted tenants. To the knowledge of the Commissioners fifty tenants had been put back by the landlords, and many more might have been. Twenty-four had been reinstated by the Estates Commissioners, and they were in treaty to restore twenty more. The amount of untenanted land purchased had been 3,293 acres.

Undue importance, he thought, had been attached to the number of transactions which had been actually concluded. It was obvious that when the Act had only been in operation for nine months a number of transactions, which were sure to be concluded in the course of a few weeks or months, were not concluded at present. It took a certain number of months to finish these complicated operations. If they simply took the number of holdings and the amount of money involved, they would form an entirely erroneous idea of the amount of success which had attended the operations. To argue on the amount of money which had been advanced up to the present would be most irrational. With reference to the amount of business transacted between the Estates Commissioners and the Land Judge, advances had been applied for in respect of twenty-eight estates embracing 987 holdings and involving £301,680. In addition, requests had been issued in respect to nineteen other estates. He agreed it was pertinent to ask whether any transactions had been finished. As a matter of fact, advances had been sanctioned in respect of nine estates embracing 194 holdings and involving £67,000 odd. Under Section 6, advances had been applied for in respect of twenty-six estates embracing 2,403 holdings, involving advances of £678,458. In addition to those, other proceedings were pending in respect of eleven other estates. The hon. Member for Waterford seemed to be disappointed that the number was not larger. It was not a very large one, but at the outset of all the discussions on land purchase, all parties concerned—landlords, tenants, hon. Members representing Irish constituencies on the opposite side of the House, and hon. Members also representing Ireland on the Unionist side of the House—were at one in impressing upon him the great desirability of not making much use of that section, but of proceeding upon the section dealing with direct sales. There had been some changes in certain directions, but hon. Members, he believed, were right in their original idea in the main. If purchase was to proceed in Ireland, it was better that the bargain should be arrived at by the persons who knew most about it. It was not wise to throw the weight of administrative influence into the scale and to appoint enormous staffs; and the employment of experts to decide value should only be resorted to when every other method had failed. Other methods showed no signs of failing. Taking the direct sales—the figures came up to 2nd July—advances had been applied for in respect of 682 estates, embracing 14,476 holdings, and involving £6,630,502, or in the three categories together 736 estates, embracing £17,866 holdings, involving £7,610,650. He did not say that represented an overwhelming success; there were many points of difficulty still to be met; but he had no doubt progress would be easier in the future, and he did not think they should lose heart when so many agreements had been arrived at voluntarily and really without friction. As a rule, the cases which they heard about in the newspapers were not those which had been successful, but those in which there had been difficulties. He would now turn to the Congested Districts Board, with reference to which he had recently given information. The number of estates actually purchased by the Board was twenty-five, embracing 1,655 holdings; but that did not give indication of the amount of purchase made. The amount of tenanted land purchased was 37,075 acres, and untenanted 28,970 acres, the purchase money involving £370,000. Negotiations were pending in respect of twenty-six other estates, embracing 24,000 acres of tenanted, and 18,000 acres of untenanted land. He rose not to make a speech, but to answer a Question and so to give information.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.) said the right hon. Gentleman could not and did not complain that they were bringing up these matters for discussion. He was afraid the experience which they had gained during the nine months from the working of the Land Act in the congested districts had been entirely unsatisfactory, and they felt, in spite of all they had done to make the Act work satisfactorily, and harmoniously, that they were being driven back to the Act of 1881, in order to have fair rents fixed. It might be doubted whether the Act of last year left the poorest parts of the country generally in a worse condition than before it was passed, but that was exactly the position in which his part of the country (Kerry) was at the present moment. During the nine months that had passed, the Congested Districts Board had purchased one holding in Kerry, of an area of 226 acres and had paid £300. That was the holding of an evicted tenant. The Estates Commissioners had purchased only four estates in the county at a cost of less than £220. It could not be said that the tenants had been unreasonable in the prices which they had offered to the landlord; but on the other hand they were quite satisfied that the landlords had been most unreasonable in the prices they had demanded from the tenants. The delay in hearing originating notices was as great as that in hearing appeals. At the beginning of the present month he understood there were 13,700 appeals unheard. As the highest number of appeals dealt with in any one year was only 3,000, it would take nearly five years to clear the list, even assuming no fresh cases were entered. Such a condition of affairs was simply intolerable. The position with regard to originating notices was equally bad. In Kerry alone, according to the last Return, there were 1,000 appeals unheard, while the number of originating notices unheard was simply alarming. A solicitor had written him enclosing a list of fifty cases of his own, in which notices of appeal were served in 1901–2, and stating that hardly anything was being done in the way of fixing rents. That was extremely unsatisfactory, and was bound to influence tenants against accepting terms of purchase. He was informed in the same letter that at the sessions just over, a great number of landlords sued for the hanging gale, a thing that had never been done before. That was the way in which landlords were co-operating to give effect to the conciliatory policy adopted last year! Their object was doubtless to drive the poor people to purchase on exorbitant terms. The Land Act of 1903 had not proved the success that had been hoped for, and the least the Government could do was to see that the Act of 1881 was given a fair opportunity of working. Another matter of complaint was the lack of progress made in the restoration of evicted tenants. He had brought a case to the notice of the Chief Secretary, in which practically the whole of an estate had been sold, with the exception of one farm, which was in the occupation of a man with no judicial lease or legal right. Under the Act of last year the Estates Commissioners had power to treat with that man, and, if they could induce him to leave, to reinstate the evicted tenant. The point he desired to put was—what would the Estates Commissioners do in that case? The matter was of considerable importance, because there were many other cases of a similar character. He also suggested, in regard to a farm in Tralee, about which he had communicated with the Congested Districts Board, that pending the decision of the Board, some one should be sent down to inspect and value the farm.

Mr. POWER (Waterford, E.) referring to the figures quoted by the Chief Secretary, reminded the right hon. Gentleman that about six weeks ago the hon. and learned Member for Waterford suggested that the Report of the Commissioners, or a summary of their proceedings, should be supplied to hon. Members. The circumstances were so complicated, and the figures so numerous, that the Committee would have been in a much better position to discuss the subject if that suggestion had been carried out. It was satisfactory to hear that the staff of the Estates Commissioners had been increased. That body had to discharge an important duty, which the people were hopeful would lead to beneficial results. In view of the enlargement of the staff, he thought that when evicted tenants sent in applications for reinstatement their letters should at least be acknowledged. The mere writing of a letter was often a severe task to the class of man concerned, and it was not much to ask that its receipt should be acknowledged. With regard to the main subject of discussion, the success or otherwise of land purchase wholly depended upon the prices tenants were asked to give. When the Bill was introduced last year, the Chief Secretary was able to prove that there were practically no arrears in the payment of instalments in Ireland. The landlords had been bringing pressure to bear upon the tenants in cases where there had been default, and it could not be said that a man who was largely in arrear was a free agent. He knew cases where considerable arrears were due, and those tenants were poor and were likely to remain poor. The Chief Secretary must recognise that, broadly speaking, the spirit of conciliation shown by the Irish tenantry had not been reciprocated by the landlords, and pressure had been brought to bear upon the tenants in regard to prices. The hon. Member for West Kerry had alluded to some cases which occurred in his constituency. He wished to refer to the case of a large property which had passed into the hands of Lord Ashton. Within the last few days seven of the most respectable tenants on the estate—one of whom was the chairman of the County Council of Waterford—waited upon his lordship and tried to come to terms for the purchase of their holdings, and they asked for a certain remission with regard to the current half-year's rent. A few days afterwards these seven tenants were singled out and proceedings were taken against them, the idea being to extort higher prices from them. He could not state exactly what the offer of the tenants was, but it was a fair offer, and one which two years ago no landlord in the South of Ireland ever thought he would get. He mentioned that as an instance of the sort of pressure which was being brought to bear upon the tenants. It was to the interests of all parties that the Land Act should work well, but if the people were to live and thrive on the farms it was necessary that free sale should exist and no pressure of this kind should be brought to bear.

Mr. MURPHY (Kerry, E.) said he wished to assocate himself with the demand which the hon. Member for West Kerry had made in reference to the cases of appeals in the county of Kerry. The explanation which the right hon. Gentleman had made was quite unsatisfactory, for the whole procedure of the Irish Land Commission had been attended by unwarrantable delay. He knew that every tenant who sought relief had to pay some costs and undergo very great hardship and inconvenience. If the tenants were to have any safeguard at all, and any remedy against landlords who would not sell, the right hon. Gentleman ought to open the door to them and offer them some protection. In the county of Kerry nothing had been done for the evicted tenants, who were men determined to get back their old holdings. The Estates Commissioners would have no difficulty in reinstating them because, owing to combination and strength of public opinion, very few of these holdings had been "grabbed." He had had a great deal of experience of evicted tenants in the county of Kerry, and, notwithstanding the opportunities given to the Commissioners to effect a settlement, nothing had been done. The Estates Commissioners had done nothing although he had made constant representations to them, and although all they needed to do would be to negotiate in order to effect a reinstatement. When a landlord was about to sell his estate, and of his own motion restore the evicted tenants to their old farms, were the Estates Commissioners going to give them any assistance towards rebuilding and restocking? Supposing a landlord did not sell and the farm was vacant although a fair rent had been fixed, were the Estates Commissioners going to do nothing until the landlord sold his entire estate? He felt very strongly upon this question of the evicted tenants in the county of Kerry and the South of Ireland. Some of the actions of the Estates Commissioners were not deserving of the complimentary references made about them, and they expected them to hold the balance more evenly between landlord and tenant. The hon. Member for South Kerry asked a Question dealing with the purchase of an estate in the southern portion of the county of Kerry, and the right hon. Gentleman replied that the terms of purchase would be open to inspection by the Estates Commissioners before they sanctioned the sale. He believed that those prices were within the zone and consequently there would be no inspection. Moreover, the estate was clearly congested and was practically an agricultural slum of the worst description. If this kind of thing was allowed to go on it would have an injurious effect.

The Congested Districts Board made a great deal of enlarging farms and restoring people to the land, and finding them more suitable employment. It had been said that 226 acres in Kerry were purchased by the Board for £300, and when the hon. Member for Galway heard this statement he turned round in accents of surprise and asked. "Do you mean £300?" There were two farms in the county of Kerry formerly held by two evicted tenants. In one case the tenant paid £2,000 for his holding a very few years before he was evicted; and in the other case the tenant had been in occupation all his life and was evicted for the non-payment of a single year's rent. The farm for which £2,000 was paid was to be sold by public auction, and it would probably realise something like £1,800, and the other would fetch about £500. But, notwithstanding that what he had stated was the true value of the farms, the Congested Districts Board in an underhand manner negotiated with the landlord and took the farms from him. He wished to know if those tenants were going to be kept out by such an improper proceeding as that. So improper was this proceeding that when he made representations to the Board as to the iniquity of this transaction the Chief Secretary made an offer of the sum of £300, and another tenant offered the sum of £150 There must have been something wrong in the initial proceedings when the Board had made the offer which he had described. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: Hush money!] It was not going to have any effect in hushing the tenants or their spokesmen. A further offer in reference to these farms had been made to the Congested Districts Board in the most straightforward manner. It represented the opinion of the parish priest, the chairman of the rural district council, the chairman of the county council, and all the representative public men of the locality, including himself, who had signed a petition representing the circumstances to the Board. If the right hon. Gentleman wanted to preserve proper conditions with reference to the land question in county Kerry, it would be much more politic and fair if he were to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for West Kerry, and deal with farms sold under fair conditions rather than with those from which unfortunate people had been evicted. One of the evicted tenants had spent the years which had intervened in Killarney Workhouse. In connection with this dispute he had received from Dr. O'Donnell and Father O'Hara the greatest possible sympathy, and although he had not been able to get them to agree to his views in reference to the position of affairs, he ascribed that to the fact that they were remote from Kerry. The Chief Secretary had listened with the greatest possible attention and patience to what he had to say, and while he did not expect the right hon. Gentleman to anticipate the decision the Board would come to at their next meeting, he wished to utilise this opportunity to tell him that the Board of which he was the head would sow the seeds of trouble and disorder in that portion of county Kerry and do a great deal of harm to the whole question of land settlement if they persisted in the improper and wrongful policy in which they had engaged in reference to these farms.

*Mr. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory) said they had been falsely led to believe that the Land Act of last year was going to settle the land question. A new vocabulary had been invented for the occasion—words like "appeasement," "reconciliation," and "new eras." As a matter of fact a situation had been created in Ireland that was the most critical for the last twenty-five years. A serious situation had arisen in Ireland, and no one who looked at it from the point of view of the future peace of Ireland could regard it except with misgiving. An attempt was being made to force the tenants into improvident land purchase bargains, and the Estates Commissioners, either from fear or indifference, were doing nothing to save the tenants. The result must be that the Irish tenants would be bound to the English Exchequer by bonds that could not be fulfilled. The probity of the Irish tenant had been vindicated at the Table of the House, but no one could account for the Irish tenant of the future. The hon. Member for South Tyrone had spoken of the congestion in the Appeal Court. That was a most serious situation indeed, for even if no new appeals were lodged in the next five years the Court would not be able to get over the work. The Government ought to see that some remedy was provided for that condition of things. The Sub-commissioners' Courts were not sufficiently manned, and he suggested that the Chief Secretary should increase the number, but not from the sources from which they had hitherto been taken, namely, broken-down landlords and their friends, agents, and retired majors. He knew a Commissioner in Queen's county who was a retired landlord. He was good for nothing as a tenant farmer, and the qualification he had for the office he now held was that latterly he had spent some time in the Militia. His father had left him a good property but he made nothing out of it.

Referring to the work of the Estates Commissioners the hon. Member said the situation was most critical, and what he and his friends most complained of was the inability or hesitation of the Commissioners to do anything for the restoration of the evicted tenants. Whether or not they had power to do so had never been properly explained in this House or in the country. He would give a concrete case in his own county. A tenant was evicted in 1883 for the non-payment of rent up to £210 a year. The landlord let the farm to his nephew for £100 a year. The nephew died and the farm was sold for £545. The situation at present was this. Negotiations were going on, and he understood that they were nearly complete, for the sale of the estate. A communication had been sent to the Estates Commissioners, on behalf of the evicted tenant, asking if they would buy the farm. Had the Commission power to make compensation to the planter or had they not? Perhaps the most serious situation was in connection with Lord Lansdowne's property. He presumed that Lord Lansdowne, as a Member of the Cabinet, had given his consent and approval to all the proposals and contents of the Land Act. But what was the fact? Lord Lansdowne had had fifty-two of his tenants evicted since 1887, and there was no appearance to-day, any more than there was twelve months ago, that single one of these tenants was to be restored to his holding. Had the Estates Commissioners, who were in the pay of the Government, no influence with Lord Lansdowne? Could they not influence him, could they not beg of him to restore the tenants to their holding? Those who had advocated a change in the land system had nothing to be ashamed of, because their action had been fully vindicated by the legislation which had been since passed, and in which Lord Lansdowne had taken a part. The tenants had been turned out of their houses on to the roadside in Queen's county, and, of course, what was wanted was that they should get possession again of their holdings. Was not the John George Adair evictions a case in which the Estates Commissioners should initiate negotiations? There was not otherwise any prospect of that property going into the Court. Landlords retained this right of the hanging gale for no other purpose than to victimise the tenants. He was a tenant farmer himself, and therefore he looked forward to a gloomy prospect if this power were retained by the landlords. A case was lately before Judge Curran in King's county, in which negotiations for sale of the property to the tenants were pending, notwithstanding which the landlord sued the tenants for a year's rent, including the hanging gale. The learned Judge said he was constrained by the strict letter of the law to grant decrees, but to mark his disapproval of the course adopted by the landlord, he placed a stay upon execution and declined to give costs. He warned the House that should those powers to sue for old arrears, including the hanging gale, continue to be used by landlords for the the purpose of forcing the tenants into accepting ruinous terms of purchase, the foundation would be laid for future trouble and discontent in Ireland. He saw the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Coghill) in his place. He was concerned for the British taxpayer, so also was he (Mr. Delany) but he was more concerned still for the future of his country.

Mr. HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.) said he would not attempt to accentuate what had been so fully put forward by the hon. Member as to the total breakdown of the Land Purchase Act, so far as restoring the evicted tenants was concerned. Unquestionably neither the eloquence, nor the sophistry of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could get over the fact that the restoration of the evicted tenants, which was one of the objects which induced him to support the Bill, had not been effected. He regretted that there were not some more English and Scottish Members present at that particular moment, because they were dealing with a question which involved a Vote of £126,342 for the Land Commission. That was a very large figure, apart from the cost of the other judicial establishments in Ireland. Everyone who read the Irish newspapers knew that appeals were being made which could not be decided in two, three, or four years. The salaries of the Land Commissioners amounted to nearly £17,000 and their duties were to hear appeals and fix fair rents. There must be some great want of attention on the part of the Executive when such a state of things existed. It was said that Mr. Justice Meredith, of whom he could only speak with the greatest respect and admiration, was unable to cope with the work, and that Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, a very experienced man, was not able to cope with it either. Four or five years ago a Bill was introduced to reduce the number of Judges. If the judicial staff of the Land Commission had broken down, why not utilise the other Judges. They were men of great authority and ability, and the discharge of the duties of a Land Judge did not require any special training. None of the present Judicial Commissioners had any special knowledge of land. They were only required to hear and balance the evidence and then decide. He himself was not advocating that course but, at any rate, it took away all excuse for the delay which existed. What had become of Mr. Commissioner Lynch, at £3,000 a year, a most experienced and clever gentleman, although comparisons were odious in connection with gentlemen clothed with quasi-judical functions. Where was Mr. Murrough O'Brien, who was a most energetic and able man, and who was most willing to work? Why was he not utilised? He, himself, had never heard of any charge against Mr

Murrough O'Brien except that he sympathised with the tenants; but it was impossible for any man in a judicial position to harden his heart against that. For fourteen years, he, as a County Court Judge, had to administer the Land Acts. He believed he did justice; but he certainly had sympathy with the tenants. That sympathy, however, did not interfere with his judicial decisions. He would ask the Chief Secretary, why were Mr Murrough O'Brien and Mr. Lynch allowed to lie fallow?

There was another point he desired to mention. It was most unfortunate that the construction of the Land Act should have doubt cast upon it. Many of them who had passed weary nights in passing the Act knew that the bonus was voted for the purpose of inducing the landlords to sell and the tenants to buy at a fair price. That was the intention of Parliament; and, as a lawyer, he was bound to say frankly that he thought that that intention had been carried out. Doubt had, however, been cast upon it in judicial quarters and it was rumoured that that doubt had been rather gratefully received, because of the state of the money market, and because the Government were not over anxious to have too many estates change hands immediately. That, however, might only have been gossip; but there was never smoke without fire. They were now in the month of July; and he would not say that the Chief Secretary had been very active and energetic in amending the Act. Why was it that the sale of untenanted land should be supposed not to carry the bonus? That was not the intention of the Legislature. He confessed that, having regard to the £100,000,000 which was pledged by the Exchequer, and the £12,000,000 in hard cash which was put down, the figures given by the Chief Secretary were not a striking answer to the impeachment brought forward by the hon. Gentleman who initiated the debate.

Mr. WYNDHAM said that no matter how many concrete cases of failure to agree might be brought up, nobody had a right to charge him with having held out expectations which had not been fulfilled. It would be useless and quite improper for him to address homilies either to landlords who were alleged to sue for hanging gales or to tenants who were alleged to have said that they would pay no rent except on sale terms. He had his own opinion about these proceedings, but a more eloquent teaching was to be found in the large sums of money which would pass where landlord and tenant had found it possible to come to agreement than in any words of stricture which he might address to either side. As regarded the alteration made in the staff dealing with the fixing of rents, what had happened was this: Before the Act of last year there were twenty officers whom he would call valuers, twelve inspectors, and fifty-eight sub-commissioners, ninety officials in all, dealing with the fixing of rent. At present ten of these valuers had become assessors, the twelve inspectors and other officers had been transformed into inspectors for purchase, and the fifty-eight sub-commissioners were reduced first to thirty-six, then to thirty, and in October would be further reduced to twenty-five. In October there would be a total of thirty-five officers dealing with rent-fixing against ninety before the Act, but there would be ninety-three officers dealing with purchase, so that there would be altogether 128 paid officials dealing with the land. The Committee need not fear that there would be any undue delay in the fixing of rents where it was desired to fix them. In the year 1899 there were over 30,000 cases outstanding — not appeals. It would have taken the existing staff three or four years to deal with that work. At present there were only 11,000 cases outstanding, and, in his opinion, they could be dealt with in a year.

As to the question whether the Estates Commissioners had power to treat with the landlord for the reinstatement of an evicted tenant, he must express his reluctance to deal with an abstract question of law but he should think the Commissioners had that power. The legal power to do a thing did not always mean the administrative opportunity to do it in each case at any particular moment. He thought the Estates Commissioners ought to concern themselves with those who had the greatest demand on their help. It was not enough to say, "Here is a man evicted in 1882; you must put him back at once." Some regard must be paid to the merits of the case and the relative claims and urgency of other cases. A great deal had been said about pressure being exercised in order to collect arrears. In the case of a man paying a second-term judicial rent there ought not to be many years of arrear. If a man was paying a first-term rent or paying a non-judicial rent and was pressed for arrears—he did not suggest that that would be done—that man could apply for a stay of execution pending the fixing of a rent. In the case of a future tenant who could not get a rent fixed, and supposing undue pressure were brought to bear and he improvidently signed a bargain which it was unlikely he would be enabled to fulfil, there was inspection for security. As to the question whether if a landlord put back an evicted tenant the Estates Commissioners could give help to that tenant, he should certainly think that was the case, making the same reservation against deciding such a point as he had made previously. The Government provided in the Bill that the money might be expended for the benefit or improvement of an estate. If they had only meant improvement they would have said improvement and nothing more. It would, in his opinion, be a very serious thing to retard the progress which was being undoubtedly made under the Land Bill of last year, and, he thought, every encouragement should be given to the landlord and tenant to take advantage of it.

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent) submitted that before they went to a division they were entitled to have an explanation as to why the Irish Land Stock was issued in so extravagant a way. It was issued at the low price of 86 per cent., and was now standing at a premium of £7. He would like to know why it was that Land Stock was now standing at that premium.

MR. WYNDHAM: I cannot answer that Question.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said it seemed a pity to interfere for the purpose of stopping this discussion, which was really a useful one, but on the following day, in the discussion on the Irish Land Bill, they would travel over much the same ground. They were desirous of having an hour at least for the discussion of the next Vote—the Board of Works Vote—a Vote which had not been discussed for a great many years and which was of vital importance, and he would therefore suggest to the Committee that they should now come to a decision upon this question.

*MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.) called attention to the congestion in the Land Courts and appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to use his influence with the Land Commissioners and endeavour to get them to sit during the Long Vacation.

Question put.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £21,773, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1905, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Public Works in Ireland."

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.) said it was six years since the Committee had an opportunity of discussing this particular Vote. The Board of Works was one of the most important institutions in Ireland and at the same time one of the quaintest of administrative curiosities. The Chief Secretary, who was supposed to direct its policy, had no control whatever over the Board—the source from which its inspiration was derived being the Treasury, a Department upon which little pressure could be exercised, and consequently Irish representatives had not been able to get much satisfaction with regard to the Board. It was really a most extraordinary institution. Its ramifications extended in almost every direction; it had its finger in practically every Irish pie. Nobody had a good word to say for it. The Board of Works was not peculiar among Irish Departments in that respect, but the unanimity with which it was denounced was surprising even for Ireland. The only matter with regard to which any satisfaction was felt was its action in the matter of ancient monuments. He agreed that the Board of Works might do very much better, but in respect of the care of ancient monuments its work at any rate was on the whole satisfactory. The public sentiment in Ireland on this question had greatly improved of late, and a general feeling prevailed that the Government should see that Irish antiquities were preserved as well as respected. Through the operation of the Land Act it was expected that a large number of ancient monuments would in course of time come under the care of the Board of Works. For example, there was the Hill of Tara, and he was anxious to know whether Tara, or any portion of it, had come under the care of the Board, and what had been done with it. He suggested that a Return should be presented to Parliament annually giving the number of ancient monuments inspected and acquired by the Board under the Land Act and the expense of keeping them in a proper state of preservation.

He wished now to allude to a matter in connection with the upkeep of Phœnix Park, which was in charge of the Board of Works. There was a storm in Ireland last year, and a number of elms originally planted by Lord Chesterfield were blown down. He did not know whether the remains of those elms had been removed yet. [AN HON. MEMBER: No; they are still there.] His hon. friend informed him they were still there. He thought it was time that the remains of those trees were removed and other trees planted in their place. He also wished to ask a Question in regard to the administration of the Grand Canal. The Grand Canal was one of the most important of their waterways in Ireland, and one of the most valuable. For a number of years this method of transit had been very much neglected, but, thanks to the late Mr. McCann, that canal now promised to be of the greatest possible value in the conveyance of farm produce. He understood that the Board of Works had got at loggerheads with the Canal Company upon the question of tolls. The Grand Canal Company published a statement upon the question and the Board of Works published an answer. There had been a further answer from the Canal Company, who seemed to have come out best. It was of the greatest importance that this canal should be used, to its utmost capacity for the benefit of the farmers and producers in that part of the country, and he urged the Chief Secretary to investigate this dispute, and see if something could not be done to adjust matters so that the canal could be used in the future to its utmost capacity.

The Board of Works was also concerned with the contracts for supplies to the public departments in Ireland. This was a question which had hitherto escaped notice. There had been rather numerous complaints about the unsatisfactory system under which contracts for supplies in the Irish public departments were advertised in local newspapers. He thought that this matter required investigation, and he suggested that the Chief Secretary should inquire into the whole question of these contracts. The contracts for supplies to these institutions were controlled by the Board of Works, and he understood there was a regulation that advertisements for contracts should be inserted in newspapers circulating in the district. Enniscorthy was a town in county Wexford, but that apparently was news to the Board of Works, because the contracts were advertised for in interesting little newspapers published in county Waterford, which did not circulate in Wexford. He would suggest that when the Board of Works were advertising for contracts in relation to Wexford the advertisements should be inserted in newspapers circulating in that county. It was not as if the county had not newspapers of its own, for it had half a dozen which were well written and widely read by the people in the county.

Sir Thomas Esmonde.

In regard to loans, the Board of Works were concerned with the advances made for various public purposes in Ireland. The Committee would be pleased to know that they did excellent business for the Treasury in that connection. The money advanced up to the present amounted to something like £45,000,000 and the interest charged varied from 4 to 6 per cent. It was only lately that the rate had been reduced to 4 per cent. The Board had been charging on the major portion of the loans 5 per cent. That was a very good investment for the Treasury. He thought the time had come when the rate of interest on these loans should be reconsidered, there being a general complaint that it was too high. There was at present under discussion a Labourers Bill. If the difficulty in regard to the labourers was to be solved, advances would have to be made to boards of guardians at a reasonable rate, and he would suggest to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury that consideration should be given to the question whether money could not be advanced at a more reasonable rate of interest than 5 or 6 per cent. It was a matter of universal complaint that great delays took place in dealing with applications from people who wished to borrow money, whether for hay barns, outhouses, or labourers' cottages, and he would suggest that some steps should be taken to expedite the work of the Board in that connection. The same remark applied to the important question of loans for the housing of the working classes in towns. The rate of interest on loans for that purpose was too high. Another difficulty which was experienced by urban authorities carrying out schemes under the Public Health Act arose from their borrowing powers being limited to double the net amount of the valuation of the sanitary district. He would illustrate this by a concrete case. In his own county there was a progressive urban council, who were anxious to provide proper housing for artisans. They had already completed an extensive scheme of artisans' dwellings, and they wanted to go on with another. But if they went on with it their financial resources would be greatly crippled. The net annual value of Enniscorthy was £7,500, and under the rule of the Board of Works their borrowing powers amounted to £15,000. He suggested that this matter should be inquired into, and that the Board of Works should consider whether it would not be possible to widen the borrowing powers of the local authorities in respect of the erection of houses for the labourers and the working classes. It would be perfectly safe to allow borrowing powers up to the extent of five or six times the annual value of these houses. Further, he did not understand why the Board of Works did not allow the urban authorities to raise money on the security of the labourers' and artisans' dwelling already erected. This was a most pressing question indeed in some parts of Ireland; and what he complained of was that they were not given even treatment all round.

He would like to ask what were the relations between the Board of Works, the Board of Agriculture, and the Local Government Board? These seemed to be rather hazy and obscure. Not so very many years ago the harbour authorities on the south-east coast of Ireland were able to obtain from the Board of Works one-third of the cost of harbour improvements, and under these conditions the harbour of Ardmore had been improved, to the great satisfaction of the local fishermen and others. But, for some reason or other, the Board of Works had declared lately that no more money was to be spent for that purpose. He would like to ask the Financial Secretary why it was that these sums of money, to which they were entitled, were no longer available. There was no reason why the fishermen on the south-eastern coast should not be placed on an equality with the fishermen in other parts of Ireland. The fishery in the South-east of Ireland should be encouraged by any reasonable Government. That and boat-building were the oldest industries in Ireland, and had been fostered by the Irish Parliament for 300 years. All the harbours on the south-east coast were connected with the Board of Works. In the case of Wicklow, another loan had to be raised to repair the work of the engineer of the Board of Works. He, himself, crumbled some of the cement with which the pier was constructed with a walking stick. Then, again, at Greystones the harbour works collapsed; but the ratepayers had to pay the loan. The Arklow Harbour was a monumental case of the incapacity of the Board of Works. The pier was built in the wrong place by the Board of Works against local advice, with the result that the harbour silted up. Arklow was the centre of the fishing industry in Ireland; and had the best appointed fishing fleet of any port. As a result of the action of the Board of Works, however, in connection with the harbour, the fishing industry at Arklow was diminishing. There was a good claim for compensation in the case of Arklow and of other harbours. For instance, Arklow wanted a dredger as a result of the mistakes of the Board of Works; and after a tremendous delay the dredger was sent down at a cost of £20 or £30 a week. Then the dredger stopped working; and an engineer was sent down. He sent it away for a change of air to Wicklow, where it was found that it had a rock in its inside. All the time, however, the people of Arklow were paying.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Why did they pay?

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE said that the hon. Gentleman should not incite them to unconstitutional practices. The Board of Works were making a lot of money out of the Irish taxpayers; and the least they could do was to provide a dredger which would work. The fishing industry had practically doubled in a generation; and it was perfectly monstrous that it should be neglected as it was. Opportunity should be given to the harbours on the south-east coast as was given elsewhere. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A (Salaries) be reduced by £100."—(Sir Thomas Esmonde.)

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH, Derbyshire, W.) said that for the short period that he had had the privilege and responsibility of representing the Board of Works he had found the officials of that Department keen and anxious to do their best. They had given him every possible assistance, and any criticisms should be directed not against them but against their representative in that House. He had carefully looked into the matter of the Arklow Harbour. Its condition was, no doubt, one of considerable difficulty, and was a subject requiring the most careful expert consideration. A dredger had been sent to this harbour and a great deal of work had been done by it, and the Harbour Commissioners had no reason to complain of the charges made for the use of it. These charges were confined to the days on which the dredger was actually working. On the broad question he might say that, when the Chief Secretary was of opinion that the Board of Works ought to advance money, they would be only too glad to do what they possibly could to carry out his wishes. They were prepared to help and support the right hon. Gentleman as far as they could in conformity with what they considered was their proper duty to the Exchequer. With regard to the question of loans, he thought the interest had been rather overstated and that the charge for sinking fund had been included. They were bound by exactly the same terms for Public Works Loans in Ireland as in England, with this possible advantage in the case of Ireland, that there was a large number of Acts under which loans were advanced in Ireland in which the rate of interest had been fixed, and that rate, he thought, was an extremely fair one. There was no more delay in advancing the loans than was compatible with the fulfilment of the various statutory obligations. It had been made a matter of complaint, with regard to some contracts, that the advertisements had only appeared in two newspapers in Waterford and not in any London newspaper. He understood that those newspapers were the best for the purpose, but in future they considered it might be advisable not to advertise by this means at all, but to send out the notices to the contractors and people interested.

A NATIONALIST MEMBER: Advertise in The Times.

*MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH: And then he hoped they would not be accused of favouritism towards any particular papers. With reference to the question of tolls on the Grand Canal, he was aware there had been some complaint, but it would, he thought, be found that the method of levying tolls which was adopted was the fairest, because they only charged sufficient to meet the necessary expenditure. He pointed out that a sum of a little over £3,000 had been placed in the Estimates for the replanting of trees in Phœnix Park. With regard to the fallen timber, it was being removed as rapidly as possible, and he hoped that before long the work would be completed. With reference to the Hill of Tara, by the Act of Parliament the Board of Works had power only to schedule the monument; the consent of both occupier and owner was required before it could be vested, and the Board of Works had very little power until the monument was vested. The Board were, however, exercising all the powers they had under the Act of Parliament, and he believed he could almost promise that no excavations would be made in the future.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE said that the hon. Member, although he had not given much satisfaction on the general question, had at any rate supplied some most useful information. He had stated that the Treasury would be prepared to meet the Chief Secretary in connection with proposals for the benefit of the fishing population. The bogey of the Treasury being thus laid, the Chief Secretary would have free scope for his benevolent intentions for the protection of the fisheries on the coasts, and the Committee would be glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what he intended to do.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.) said that one of the most pressing cases for the provision of a proper harbour was that of the town of Bangor. It might be a local matter in itself, but it afforded an example of the treatment which was making the people of Ulster feel that the Government were always turning a deaf ear to their claims in order to listen to the demands of the Nationalists in other parts of Ireland. The question of the provision of a harbour at Bangor was brought before the Board of Works two years ago, and at the suggestion of that Department plans and specifications were prepared. After keeping those plans for four months, the Board of Trade told the applicants to turn to the Irish Government for help. Eventually an inspection was held, the justice of the claim admitted, and an offer of £2,500 only out the £10,000 required made. He thought that if the matter had concerned any district other than the Loyalist part of Ireland the claim would not have been so niggardly treated. He appealed to the Government not to continue this method of treatment, but to deal with the loyal Ulster constituencies in as generous a manner as they dealt with Nationalist constituencies in other parts of Ireland.

Mr. WYNDHAM said he noted with satisfaction the prospect held out by the Financial Secretary that if he went to the Treasury for a loan he would not find the coffers empty. There was no justification for the allegation of the hon. Member for North Down that the Treasury had lent money on easier terms to Nationalist districts than to the constituencies in Ulster. There was no time to go into the matter on the present occasion, but on another opportunity he would be able to show that the hon. Member was entirely in error.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE said that what was wanted was not a loan, but a new Marine Works Bill.

Mr. WYNDHAM said he did not understand the Financial Secretary to say that the Treasury would be able to give a free grant of money which would be necessary for another Marine Works Bill. The Marine Works Act authorised free grants, but they were attached by statute to the scheduled districts.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE suggested that another Marine Works Bill should be introduced not applicable to the scheduled districts.

TIBET.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford) said that, as he had been asked at Question time to communicate any news received at the India Office with regard to Tibet, he would read to the House the following telegram, which had been received at 5.35 p.m.—

> "Tibetans having refused to evacuate Jong, Macdonald resumed operations at 1 p.m., 5th July, demonstrating only that day. On the morning of 6th July a portion of the Gyangtse town assaulted and our position made good. At 4 p.m., 6th July, wall of Jong breached. Jong assaulted and captured by 6 p.m. Enemy's strength estimated at 5,000. Their losses not known yet. Our estimates (full return not yet received): Killed—32nd Sikh Pioneers, Lieutenant Gurdon; 8th Gurkha Rifles, three men. Wounded—40th Pathans, Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell, Captain Preston; 8th Gurkha Rifles, Lieutenant Grant; 23rd Sikh Pioneers, Lieutenant Mitchell; First Royal Fusiliers, three men—all slightly; about twenty native ranks."

And, it being after half-past Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next; Committee also report Progress; to sit again this evening.

EVENING SITTING.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. Jeffreys (Hampshire, N.) in the Chair.]

Class II.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £14,371, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1905, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the Chief Secretary in Dublin and London, and of the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums."

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.) drew attention to the action of the Ballinasloe Asylum Committee in appointing to the post of medical superintendent the junior assistant, Dr. Kirwan, over the head of his senior Dr. Mills. Dr. Mills, who had been acting-superintendent for some four months after the death of Dr. Fletcher, and Dr. Kirwan, his junior assistant, were the only two candidates for the post, and when the applications were being considered by the asylum committee, the chairman, the Bishop of Galway, proposed that the post should be given to Dr. Kirwan, the gentleman who seconded the proposition arguing that inasmuch as 96 per cent. of the inmates of the asylum were Roman Catholics the medical superintendent should also be a Roman Catholic. It was in the power of the Lord-Lieutenant to sanction or refuse to sanction the appointment made by the committee, and the question he desired to ask the Chief Secretary, a question which he previously put across the floor of the House without a satisfactory answer being returned, was for what reason the junior assistant had been promoted over the head of his senior whose qualifications were equal and whose ability was unquestioned. The answer previously given by the Chief Secretary was that the matter was being investigated and that no decision had yet been arrived at. He himself had discovered, however, that when the committee asked for the sanction of the Lord-Lieutenant to the appointment they had made, he wrote to ascertain their reasons for appointing the junior. The committee considered the matter and came to the conclusion that the Lord-Lieutenant had no right to ask for their reasons and therefore refused to give them. The Lord-Lieutenant had apparently acquiesced in this and had sanctioned the appointment. He contended that this appointment was purely the result of religious bigotry, and he wanted a categorical reply from the Chief Secretary to the Question. Was not Dr. Kirwan appointed to this post because he was a Roman Catholic and Dr. Mills was not? This was the work of the Catholic Association at Ballinasloe.

Mr. MACVEAGH (Down, S.) said there was no Catholic Association at Ballinasloe.

Mr. SLOAN retorted that there were members of that organisation on the Ballinasloe Asylum Committee. [Cries of "No, there are not" and "Name one."] The Bishop of Galway was one. [Several Irish Members: No he is not.]

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) submitted that the hon. Member had no right to state what was not true when he was told it was not true.

An Hon. Member from the Unionist side here appealed to the Deputy-Chairman for a fair hearing for the hon. Member.

Mr. SLOAN said it was undeniable that the senior medical attendant of the Ballinasloe Asylum was repudiated because he was a Protestant. Only recently they had in Belfast a homily addressed to them by the Lord-Lieutenant on the necessity of showing tolerance, and whilst the Lord-Lieutenant was preaching tolerance to them he was allowing this act of intolerance in Ballinasloe. How could hon. Gentlemen opposite suppose that the Protestants of Ireland would consider the claims of Roman Catholics when they themselves acted in this way. He knew the Chief Secretary was not responsible in this matter, but he was the only person to whom complaints could be addressed in this House. The Lord-Lieutenant had a difficult task to perform, no doubt, but it was not made easier by showing favour to any particular Party, and in raising this question now no hon. Member would consider that he (Mr. Sloan) was out of place. To show the favour shown to Dr. Kirwan, he pointed out that while that gentleman was allowed to remove the British emblem (the Crown) from the stationery used in the asylum and substitute "On the people's service" for "On His Majesty's Service" on the envelopes, when Dr. Mills suspended an attendant, who was subsequently fined by a magistrate £5 for the offence, for maltreating a patient in the asylum the committee censured him, not openly, by reinstating the attendant. Since then he was glad to say that as the result of an inquiry that attendant had had to resign. In this case the Catholic Association had been supreme and bigotry and intolerance triumphant; in this case the Party opposite had proved themselves superior to Dublin Castle and the present Government; but he submitted this matter to the Committee in the hope that they would show their sense of the injustice that had been done by supporting him in the reduction he now moved. He moved that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £14,271, be granted for the said Service"—(Mr. Sloan.)

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said he did not see why the Ballinasloe Asylum should not be allowed to choose its own medical superintendent. The Lord-Lieutenant, after a full inquiry into the whole case, did not feel that a sufficiently strong case had been made out to overrule the decision of the committee of that asylum. The asylum was governed by a joint committee elected by the county councils of Galway and Roscommon, but the accusation which had been made was chiefly against the county of Galway. Dr. Mills was the head of the male lunatic department and Dr. Kirwan was at the head of the female lunatics, and their positions were as nearly as possible equal. The Lord-Lieutenant found that one of the doctors was two or three years senior, but he did not say that the committee had acted from a religious point of view. He was glad that in this discussion no reflection had been made upon either of the candidates. As far as the position of the representatives of county Galway were concerned, they had acted simply in the interests of the ratepayers, because the voters were constantly grumbling about the heavy taxation inflicted upon the county, and asking why the asylum cost such a heap of money. There was a feeling that Dr. Mills had not attended the committee meetings as much as he ought to have done. He had no hesitation in stating, upon information he had received from one well acquainted with the facts, that if the case had been reversed, if Dr. Kirwan had been a Protestant and Dr. Mills a Catholic, the election would have gone the same way. The appointment made was well justified. That was a statement which he got from those who knew well the whole of the circumstances, and he believed that the reasons he had given very largely contributed to the majority in favour of Dr. Kirwan. He could not see why the Lord-Lieutenant should step in and override the opinion of the local committee. If such action did take place it might very well be asked, "Why give the Irish people local government at all?" The question raised by the hon. Member for South Belfast was a large one. If the question of religion was to be raised, where would they stop? Ninety-six per cent. of the people of Galway were Catholics and only 4 per cent. were Protestants, yet the Protestants had nearly four-fifths of the good appointments. He was informed that the appointment of Dr. Kirwan was made on grounds of finance.

MR. SLOAN said that reason had never been given by any member of the committee making the appointment.

COLONEL NOLAN replied that although that reason was not given, some of the speeches made by the committee were perhaps of the character indicated by the hon. Member. Some members of the committee disclaimed the question of religion altogether. He did not say that there was anything else against Dr. Mills, but he knew that Dr. Kirwan had been most attentive at the meetings of the finance committee.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, S.) said he always thought that Englishmen forgot one peculiar characteristic of Irishmen, and that was that they were born politicians. No matter in what position in the world they were placed, even in a lunatic asylum they exhibited this qualification. The hon. Member for South Belfast had raised the question of the appointment of the superintendent of an asylum. In England that would be looked upon as a very humdrum and commonplace matter, but in Ireland it was impossible to divest it of questions which cropped up naturally in the Irish mind, because Irishmen were born politicians. Take the case of this asylum board—it was not elected by the lunatics, if it had been it would have been much more sensible—that board went down to the asylum, sat round a table, and, presided over by a Bishop, proceeded to deal with important matters. What was the business they transacted? They took the buttons off all the servants in the institution, because they were aggravated and annoyed, and possibly in a rage, when they saw one of these servants enter their august presence with buttons having on them an Irish harp, and over the harp a crown. At all hazards that crown must come off, and also the buttons. The first duty that Dr. Kirwan had to perform when he was elected superintendent was to interview the contractor in order to get these buttons put right by removing the crown. On the paper of the asylum was stamped the letters "O.H.M.S." Such a thing could never be borne in a lunatic asylum in county Galway, and the asylum board had, he supposed at some expense, succeeded in erasing the objectionable letters, and replacing them by the letters "O.P.S.," which meant "On the People's service". That satisfied the aspirations of this lunacy board. If they had confined themselves to that he would not have said a word. But there was a more important point. The hon. Member for South Belfast, who was a very valuable member of the Party to which he belonged, had spoken about the election of a superintendent. The two candidates were Dr. Mills and Dr. Kirwan. The former had been fourteen years in the service of the asylum, and the latter only seven years; and the former had acted as superintendent for fourteen months during the illness of the former superintendent. Moreover, the board, which was almost entirely composed of Roman Catholic members bore testimony to the great service Dr. Mills had rendered. Notwithstanding all these superior qualifications, Dr. Mills was passed over and Dr. Kirwan appointed. A member of the board said at the time that he supported Dr. Kirwan's candidature because he was a Roman Catholic, and, in fact, this religious consideration was the cause of Dr. Kirwan's appointment. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway disclaimed on the part of Dr. Kirwan's appointment anything of a religious or sectarian character.

COLONEL NOLAN: No, no!

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said that was the impression he derived from the hon. and gallant Member's remarks.

COLONEL NOLAN: What I said was that a large portion of the members of the committee were not guided by religious considerations.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said that nobody could conceive that a committee deciding between two candidates, one with seven and the other with fourteen years service—the latter being a most distinguished medical practitioner, who had earned the respect of every man who knew him—would have chosen the junior candidate unless they had acted from religious motives. Ninety per cent. of the persons in the asylum were Roman Catholics, and it was as though the board had said to Dr. Mills, who had given up a large part of his life in the service of his country, "Thus far and no further shall you or any Protestant go." That was the tragedy of the matter. When he heard of this extremely unjust action of this asylum board, he wrote to His Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, but with very little effect. If the hon. and learned Member for Waterford saw a flagrant injustice done to one of his own religion he would make just such a representation to the Lord-Lieutenant.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said that if a friend of his or a co-religionist of his were passed over simply because of his religion he would not dream of interfering on that ground, and he had never made an appeal on that ground during the whole course of his public life.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said that all he could say was that the hon. and learned Member ought to interfere under such circumstances. This was not a ques- of religion or bigotry, but of gross injustice. [AN HON. MEMBER: - It is a question of a job.] He wrote to the Lord-Lieutenant, and he hoped that under the circumstances the appointment would not have been sanctioned. But his representations did not have the desired effect. Replying to a Question on the subject in the House, the Chief Secretary said the power of appointment was vested in the asylum committee, not in the Government. There was certain power in the Government to veto an appointment, but only in connection with matters of qualification. That was in April, but he did not think the Chief Secretary held that opinion now, because when he was questioned on the 21st of May he said that the right which rested with the Lord-Lieutenant of granting or withholding his concurrence was unconditional, and, in exercising that right, His Excellency discharged a duty imposed upon him by statute and his duty was not restricted to ascertaining whether the candidate appointed had the necessary qualifications, but the circumstances must be considered. The Lord-Lieutenant took advice in Ireland on the subject. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: Inspector Saunderson's.]

MR. FLAVIN: What qualification had your son for the job?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said this was a question where there were two Irishmen candidates for a vacancy, and one who had served seven years was put over the head of the other who had served twelve years, and the only reason was that he was a Roman Catholic. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: How long did your son serve?] This was an act of flagrant injustice to a man who naturally had every reason to believe in the circumstances that when a vacancy occurred he would be appointed. But no, because he was a Protestant he was passed over. [NATIONALIST cries of "No."] No one had a single word against the reputation of Dr. Kirwan or Dr. Mills, but Dr. Kirwan was chosen because it was said that 90 per cent of the lunatics were Roman Catholics. This was a far more important matter than the mere appointment of a superintendent of an Irish lunatic asylum. It showed the forces that were now at work in Ireland. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would not deny it. They had all heard of the Catholic Association which had for its purpose to secure for Roman Catholics all that could be obtained, and the boycotting of every Protestant not only from posts, but in trade. [NATIONALIST cries of "No."] That was the avowed object of the association, but when hon. Members found that it caused an outcry in the country undoubtedly they turned a cold shoulder on it. But the association still existed. A meeting of the Maynooth Union was addressed by the most Rev. Dr. Hogan who said that all that they wanted was an organisation with branches in every parish and district in the country well disciplined, well officered, and supplied with a fund to meet emergencies.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I rise to order. I wish to know whether it is in order on the Chief Secretary's salary to discuss the proceedings of the Maynooth Union.

*THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I understood the right hon. Gentleman was discussing a union which is under the Vote.

MR. HAYDEN: I may explain that the Maynooth Union is a union of ex-students of Maynooth College, and that it in no way comes under this Vote.

*THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman would be out of order in discussing that.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said he bowed to that ruling. What he wanted to show was that at Ballinasloe an act of flagrant injustice had been done and that it was part of a general policy adopted in Ireland.

MR. WYNDHAM said if his hon. and gallant friend was attacking him in connection with a particular act at Ballinasloe Lunatic Asylum he should prefer that the charge should be stated as it was one to which he should like to reply.

*THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That is not the point. The right hon. Gentleman is quite in order in attacking the policy of the Chief Secretary or the Government, but I do not think he is in order in going into too much detail on minor points which do not directly affect the Chief Secretary.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said he believed that the Government had not appreciated the condition of affairs in Ireland and were not aware of the organisation which existed in that country, and which had its fruition at Ballinasloe. As the Chairman had ruled that that was not in order he would not pursue the subject. The appointment made at Ballinasloe was a small affair to the House of Commons, but it was a great and sad affair to the man whose career had been blighted. This pointed the direction in which the wind blew in Ireland.

MR. FLAVIN: It has been blowing in your direction for a long time.

*THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I hope hon. Gentlemen will not make these interruptions, otherwise it is impossible to carry on debate.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said peace could never be secured in Ireland except by the action of the people themselves, and the exercise of fair play and toleration on the part of the different religious bodies. No evidence that would stand sifting in that House could be brought against the Protestant minority showing that they had discarded a Roman Catholic simply because he was a Roman Catholic and had put a junior secretary over his head. A gulf dug by bigotry separated two religious classes and anyone who desired to keep that gulf open deserved ill of Ireland.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.) said that after listening to the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman one would have imagined that they were not in the House of Commons, but in the Ballinasloe Lunatic Asylum. He had never in his experience of the House of Commons witnessed a more grotesque exhibition than that to which the House had just been treated. The facts of the case were that there was a vacancy in the lunatic asylum for a medical superintendent and there were two candidates. One was senior to the other; but the junior candidate had greater qualifications—[MINISTERIAL cries of "No"]—and he received the appointment. Dr. Kirwan had the special advantage of being a Galway man, and naturally the people of the county were inclined to give this appointment to the man whose qualifications exceeded those of the other candidate, and whose only limitation was that he was junior by two or three years. This board, which had been pilloried in all the Unionist papers in England, and had been held up to odium by the orators, of whom the right hon. and gallant Gentleman and his friends were the chief guides, had given an addition of salary to the gentleman who did not receive the appointment. That board was charged in this House with being a sort of bigoted institution for the persecution of Protestants. In another case they gave an advance of salary of £10 a year to Dr. Collins, a Protestant official, but the Local Government Board refused to sanction it. He would ask those who had listened to this tirade of abuse from the hon. and gallant Gentleman—a tirade which they heard on every occasion when Irish questions were dealt with in this House—whether this farce should not end. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman was getting very old, almost as hoary as the jokes and witticisms which he had imposed on the House during the long period he had been the chief prop of foreign ascendancy in Ireland. Because the policy which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman supported was disappearing before the breath of a new and tolerant spirit, he and his Party came here and assailed a nation, and impeached the honour of the people. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman how many Roman Catholics held offices of trust under the Corporation of the City of Belfast, where one-third of the population were Roman Catholics. Was there a single appointment held there by a Catholic? Turning to the right hon. Gentleman's own constituency, he asked how many Catholics held positions of trust in Portadown. The hon. Member for South Antrim smiled. He would ask him how many Catholics held appointments in Lurgan, where half the population were Catholics. [AN HON. MEMBER: It is not.] Yes, half the population of Lurgan were Catholics, and yet it was absolutely impossible for a Catholic to get an appointment in the gift of an elected body in that town. If the right hon. Gentleman was not responsible for this condition of things, he at least knew that it operated wherever his Party was placed in power, and he should be the last man to come here and impeach a public authority of the character of the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians, and attack a whole race for action which was perfectly excusable and absolutely defensible.

He rose not to discuss the Ballinasloe case but for the purpose of dealing with another matter, which involved an infamous attack on the tolerant spirit of the Catholics of Ireland. The attack had been based on a recent occurrence in that country. Had the hon. Member for South Antrim ever heard of Constable Anderson? From what had been appearing in the newspapers he expected the hon. Member to come there and impeach the Chief Secretary and the representatives of the Government in Ireland because of the dismissal and subsequent proceedings in connection with the case of Constable Anderson. The hon. Member had told them that a gross outrage against liberty had been perpetrated in that case.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): Hear, hear!

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN said the hon. Member could say "Hear, hear," but why was he compelled to force him to defend the policeman who was said to be the victim of an organised conspiracy on the part of Catholics? Hon. Gentlemen opposite, by Questions and insinuations in that House, and by speeches on Orange platforms, and other arenas of public activity, had told them of the villainy of Sir Antony MacDonnell, of the part he had played in this tragedy or comedy, and of the outrageous way in which Anderson had been treated because he was a Protestant. Well, this was the House of Commons. This was not an Orange platform at Portadown, nor was it the Custom House steps at Belfast. If hon. Members wished to impeach the Chief Secretary, this was the place to do it. Nationalist Members had no reason to defend the right hon. Gentleman, but with all his limitations he had always the courage to come there and face the music, and he was present that night to face even Orange music. Why did not the hon. Member for South Antrim, who had made a record for himself as a great statesman, rise and say in this House what he had stated outside?

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: The hon. Member is going to rise as soon as the hon. Gentleman has finished.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN said that what he wanted to ask was why are hon. Gentlemen opposite hiding behind the Ballinasloe Lunatic Asylum? Why had not hon. Gentlemen opposite brought forward this case in the House as they had threatened to do? Why had his hon. friend the Member for South Tyrone——

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Do not bring me into the case.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN said he was very glad that there were some things that the hon. Member wanted to be out of. But the hon. Gentleman would permit him to refer, in a friendly way, to those who were hiding behind the Ballinasloe Lunatic Asylum. Why had hon. Gentlemen opposite shirked the responsibility of bringing the whole of this case before the House? He and his friends did not impeach Constable Anderson; he was impeached before a tribunal composed of policemen, and the prosecutor was a policeman. The result of that inquiry was that Constable Anderson was dismissed. He did not call in question the judgment of such a tribunal which said that Constable Anderson was guilty; but immediately hon. Gentlemen opposite proceeded to say that it was because Constable Anderson was a Protestant that he had been dismissed. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh immediately proceeded to raise the war-cry that a gross outrage had been committed, and a great wrong done to a worthy officer, and demanded that the constable should be reinstated, irrespective of the merits of the case. Neither he nor his friends desired to raise the question, although they knew that the constable had been rightly convicted. But hon. Gentlemen opposite immediately proceeded to say that the constable had been dismissed because he was a Protestant, and to denounce everyone connected with the case. He invited the hon. Member for South Antrim, who had taken a leading part in this matter, to demand a complete inquiry. The Chief Secretary had been attacked for reinstating this man. Why did those who attacked not formulate their charges? He was not there to attack Constable Anderson, but to discuss the merits of the case, and to protest with all his strength against this conspiracy to hold up the Irish people as bigots who would not allow Protestants to live in Ireland, and to malign his dear friend Father O'Hara—one of the most tolerant and generous-hearted Catholic priests in Ireland. This was not a case in which politics should be allowed to play any part. All he wanted was that the whole matter should be probed to the bottom.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG said that there was not time to take up the case that evening [Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the IRISH Benches, and an HON. MEMBER: You run away from it.] He was very sorry that he could not oblige hon. Members opposite; but the representatives of the Government in charge of the Vote were aware of the reasons for not taking up the case that evening. On another day hon. Gentlemen would probably hear more of it than they wanted.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Do I understand that a special day has been promised to hon. Members opposite for the discussion of this case?

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: No; the hon. Member, however, is well aware that a third day is to be given to the Irish Estimates, and that then Irish questions would be confined to those that could be raised on the Chief Secretary's salary. [Cries of "No, no!" from the IRISH Benches.]

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Nothing of the kind. You have lost your chance, and you know it.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: I can assure the hon. Gentleman we have no intention of running away.

AN HON. MEMBER on the IRISH Benches: Tackle it now.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG said that he would not tackle it on that occasion. He would refer to it on the third day of the Irish Estimates. He proposed now to return to the salubrious town of Ballinasloe. He had a paper of 16th May which contained a full report of the convention held in that town, and no one who read it would deny that Dr. Kirwan was elected on purely religious grounds. This was a case which should be decided in the full light of day. The Lord-Lieutenant, acting on the advice either of the Chief Secretary or of the Under-Secretary, and in spite of the fact that the asylum committee refused to give any reasons for their superseding one official by another, confirmed this appointment. This was regrettable, for the case from start to finish had raised very bitter feeling in the North of Ireland. The Ulster Unionists were a small Party, but they would be wanting in their duty not only to their constituents, but to the country, if they failed to make this protest. The man who was responsible for so much of what they considered bad and unfair government in Ireland was the Under-Secretary. A permanent civil official had no right to act except on the orders of his superiors. The House should be told what connection Sir Antony MacDonnell had had with this case. What correspondence had passed between him and the Bishop of Raphoe or the Archbishop of Tuam? What were the considerations or motives which had decided either the Chief Secretary or the Under-Secretary to give consent to this abominable job?

*MR. LONSDALE asked leave to say that, as secretary of the Irish Unionist Party, he made a distinct arrangement with the Chief Unionist Whip that a whole day should be given for the discussion of the Anderson case on the Chief Secretary's salary when Irish Estimates were again put down.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said that statement came upon him as a complete surprise, and was at variance with the statement made to him on behalf of the Government.

MR. WYNDHAM said that so far as he was acquainted with the arrangement for taking the Irish Votes, he thought the hon. Member for Mid Armagh must be in error in supposing that the Chief Government Whip had made such an astonishing promise as that a whole day was to be devoted to the discussion of a single case. He could not have given any undertaking of the kind.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said his relations with the Chief Secretary on matters of this kind had always been most pleasant and straightforward, and he should be sorry if any misunderstanding were to arise in the present instance. He had protested against the Vote for the Chief Secretary's salary being taken that night, but the right hon. Gentleman insisted on having an opportunity of defending himself against the personal attacks made upon him. Any understanding with the Irish Unionists that the Vote should be put down again would be a gross breach of faith with him, of which he was sure neither the Chief Secretary nor the Chief Whip would be guilty.

*MR. LONSDALE said there could be no question that the Chief Whip informed him that a day and a half would be given for the discussion of the Chief Secretary's salary, and on that understanding it was arranged that the Anderson case should not be raised that night, when there would not have been time for a full debate.

MR. WYNDHAM said that perhaps the hon. Gentleman would raise the question on the adjournment of the House, if there was any dispute between him and the Chief Whip. In the course of the debate reference had been made to the comedy and tragedy which went hand in hand in Ireland. That was so. In the speeches on both sides there were phrases that moved them to laughter and phrases which brought home to them how sad was the heritage of Ireland with respect to sectarian animosity. He appreciated the brilliant humour with which that tragedy had been relieved in the course of the debate, but he also felt the tragedy. The Chief Secretary intervening in such a debate must adopt a part which was tiresome because it was a part so detached from the passion and feelings which animated the Irish representatives on both sides of the House. What was the foundation of the charge which had been made in various quarters outside the House that he and that most distinguished public servant who was associated with him, Sir Antony MacDonnell, were actuated in the discharge of their duty by improper motives? The standing committee of an Irish county council recently appointed two officers—one a medical superintendent and the other an assistant medical officer. The first appointment they were competent to make under the Local Government Act, and the second appointment they were not competent to make, inasmuch as under the rules of that Act the officer must be unmarried, and the candidate they proposed to appoint was married. In the first case he—not Sir Antony MacDonnell—advised that it was the duty of the Unionist Minister of a Unionist Government to carry out in the spirit and the letter a Unionist Act of Parliament; in the second case, as the Minister responsible for the upholding of law in Ireland, he advised that the appointment was improper and could not be sanctioned. To found on those cases the charge that the Irish Administration was animated by sectarian bigotry was really a deplorable use of imagination. He knew that in many parts of Ireland, and, by reflex action in this country, there were persons who honestly believed that there was a widespread movement to drive Protestants out of all positions, public and private, in Ireland. He did not think it himself. He did not say that in no case were elected representative bodies actuated by such considerations; he knew they were. He was sorry for it. It would be far better if they had a single eye to the merits of the candidate. He deprecated going into motives in matters of this sort, but one was almost forced to do so. He had given to the section of the Act his unbiassed and careful consideration; he had consulted his legal advisers, and also the authors of the Act of 1898, and he was convinced that under Section 84 of the Local Government Act it was the duty of the committee of the county council to make this appointment, to appoint a properly qualified man, that the Lord-Lieutenant had the right to give or withhold his concurrence, and that that right was not limited to seeing that the statutory qualifications were fulfilled. But was that right so large as to amount to a repeal of the section, because the demand now made, however, practically amounted to this, that the Chief Secretary should repeal the section and should be the person to make the appointment? Could anyone imagine the President of the Local Government Board in England being asked to consider an appointment of this kind?

Mr. SLOAN asked the right hon. Gentleman to explain how it was then that the Lord-Lieutenant thought it right to ask for the reasons why the junior was elected over the senior.

Mr. WYNDHAM said it was because he agreed that the selection of the junior officer was a somewhat startling fact, and it placed upon the Government the duty of satisfying themselves whether the statutory requirements were fulfilled Inquiry was made, which satisfied them that the man actually selected was qualified, and then after careful consideration of the provision in the Act of 1898, he came to the conclusion which he. had announced. He found himself at difference on many points with the position taken up in the past by the Unionist Party in Ireland and their historical predecessors, but at the same time he could understand the view they had taken. For instance, some opposed Catholic Emancipation; he differed from them, but he could understand their position. Some thought the extension of the franchise a mistake; he differed from them, but he could understand their positition. Some thought the Local Government Act was a mistake; he differed from them, but he could understand their position. But when he came to the point that full local government had been given to Ireland in 1898, and that a legislative gift given with one hand should in administration be withdrawn by the other, he confessed he could not understand the position. By that method of procedure there would be given the worst form of local government that could be given to any country, a far worse form than was superseded in Ireland. If he attempted to do the duties which had been delegated to the county councils, it would cease altogether to be local government; it would be government by a British Minister whose time was largely occupied with branches of Irish and Imperial business. Was it conceivable that any man in his position who wished to do his duty would take on himself the responsibility, having to give attention to many other matters, of deciding why a local body selected one man for an appointment instead of another? His responsibility began and ended in seeing that the law had been fulfilled, and had not been broken by a body to whom powers had been delegated by Parliament.

Mr. WILLIAM MOORE (Antrim, N.) said this was not merely a question of the appointment of a medical superintendent, it was a case which tested the principle whether under local government in Ireland a gentleman should by reason of his religion be prevented from enjoying the natural profits of his profession in the land of his birth. The responsibility did not rest altogether with the local body, for the Lord-Lieutenant had the power of approval, and without that approval the law made the election invalid. The Lord-Lieutenant had that controlling power that he might prevent injustice. A question of fact had to be considered. Did this appointment proceed on the lines of natural justice or of injustice? He submitted that it was a dereliction of duty on the part of the Lord-Lieutenant not to exercise his controlling power.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) called attention to the fact that under a rule of the House the Acts of the Lord-Lieutenant could not be criticised except on a special Motion.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said that that was so, and the hon. Member would not be in order in pursuing the subject.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE said that what he was really criticising was the Chief Secretary and the advice he gave to the Lord-Lieutenant. The Irish Government were so startled by the appointment that they actually went through the form of asking for reasons. The board refused to give reasons, and yet the appointment was confirmed. Therefore, the Executive Government was responsible equally with the county council. This was not merely a question of what had happened at Ballinasloe; it was a question of how the Local Government Act was to be worked in remote country districts. Was the House going to allow the Local Government Act to be worked for the exclusion of Protestants? He contended that he and his friends were right to bring the case before the House. So long as he was a Member of the House he should always, no matter what the consequences, assist his hon. friends in fastening blame on the Irish Executive where it rested with them.

MR. JOHN REDMOND complained that the Chief Secretary, after overriding his protest and putting down his Vote on the ground that he might have the earliest opportunity of repelling a personal attack, had not alluded to the Anderson case. His silence gave colour to the suggestion that an arrangement had been made behind the backs of the Irish Party that the third day of the Irish Estimates should be devoted to that subject. Although the Anderson case had not been raised on the other side of the House, it had been raised by the hon. Member for Kilkenny, and in a way which gave the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity which he said he was seeking. That being so, and the Vote having been put down for the specific purpose, he thought they had reason to complain that the right hon. Gentleman should have sat down without saying a word on the matter. He would like to hear whether it was true that the Government had promised a third day of Irish Supply to enable these Gentlemen who had not opened this case to do so then. If that were so, away to the winds went the arrangement which had governed the management of Supply for a long time past, and it would be necessary to bring the matter before the House and the Prime Minister to see whether the pretence of taking Supply in the order which Members interested in it desired was to be kept up any longer, or whether in the case of Irish Supply arrangements were to be made in contravention of the understanding, and behind the backs of the Irish Party.

MR. WYNDHAM said he spoke till a quarter to twelve and could not deal with the Anderson case in a quarter of an hour when it had not been brought before him by those who had expressed their intention of making the attack. He was sorry it was not brought before him as he was perfectly prepared to deal with it.

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Sir A. ACLAND-HOOD, Somersetshire, Wellington) said the arrangement made was that the Land Commission and the Board of Works Votes should be taken at the afternoon sitting, and that the Chief Secretary's salary should be put down for nine o'clock. He understood then that it was the desire of Irish Unionist Members to discuss the case of Constable Anderson. On Monday night he was informed that the three hours of the evening sitting were not considered adequate for the discussion. He saw the Chairman of the Irish Unionist Party, who said he considered three hours sufficient for the discussion. He therefore came to the conclusion that the arrangement which had been announced to the House must be adhered to. It would be impossible to carry on the business of Supply unless arrangements, when made, were adhered to. A letter which had been published in the Press was sent to him, and in his reply, which he thought ought also to be published, after stating the arrangement which had been made and the necessity for carrying it out, he pointed out that in this session it was proposed to give not only an evening sitting to the Vote for the Chief Secretary's salary, but to put the Vote down as first Order on the last day of Irish Supply. In doing that he believed he was carrying out what the hon. and learned Member for Waterford asked him to do

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: Oh, no; quite the contrary.

Sir A. ACLAND-HOOD said his recollection of the conversation with the hon. and learned Member was that the Vote should be put down as first Order on the last day of Irish Supply because there were many questions in which hon. Members opposite were greatly interested and which they would wish to bring up on that Vote. But he made no suggestion that the case of Constable Anderson should be brought up. In fact, it was impossible for him to do anything of the kind, as it was within the absolute discretion of the Chairman to call on any Member he chose, and that Member could bring forward whatever matter he liked. He had given no pledge to either side as to the course the debate should take, but, in somewhat difficult circumstances, he had endeavoured to carry out his undertaking to the best of his ability.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND rose to speak.

And, it being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Moved, That the order made on the 14th day of March last, "That no Provisional Order Confirmation Bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a second time after the 16th day of June next," be dispensed with, and that the Bill be now read 2^{a}; agreed to; Bill read 2^{a} accordingly and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY BILL.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^{a}."—(Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

On Question, Bill read 3^{a}.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (The Marquess of LONDONDERRY): My Lords, perhaps I may be allowed, in moving an Amendment to this Bill, to say a few words on behalf of the Post Office. My noble friend the Postmaster-General considered that it would be disrespectful to your Lordships' House if his Department did not explain why they have taken the course followed in regard to this Bill. I gather from the Postmaster-General that a mutual agreement has been arrived at between the Post Office and the Great Eastern Railway Company with regard to the proposed Amendment, but my noble friend the Acting Chairman of Committees holds the opinion that it might have been possible for the Post Office to have proceeded in this matter by means of a public Bill. If they had considered it possible to get a Bill passed in their interests on these grounds during the present session, they would undoubtedly have taken that course; but they considered that at this stage of the session, and in view of the various important matters before Parliament, it would have been futile to have proceeded in that way.

But I would point out on behalf of the Postmaster-General, that it is very important that his Department should assert their rights in connection with traffic of all sorts and kinds. The Department fully recognise that in all probability it will be some time before the motor system is developed to its fullest extent, and until that is the case it may not be the duty of the Post Office to take advantage generally of that system of transport for their mails; but they also feel that they should lose no time in asserting the rights they undoubtedly have of making use of all kinds of locomotion. The Postmaster-General is extremely anxious that every respect should be paid to your Lordships' House, and has asked me, therefore, to make these few remarks in moving the following Amendment—

"And whereas it has been agreed between the Company and the Postmaster-General that the following provisions shall apply with respect to the conveyance of mails by omnibuses, coaches, carts, and other road vehicles, be it therefore enacted that—

(1) The Company shall convey by any omnibus, coach, cart, or other road vehicle provided, worked, or used on a regular or periodical service in connection with, or in extension of, their railway system, and habitually moved by mechanical power, all such mails (with the officers of the Post Office in charge thereof) as may be tendered by the Postmaster-General for conveyance by such vehicle, and shall receive and deliver such mails from or to any Post Office or officer of the Post Office on the route of such vehicle."

Then follow conditions with which I do not think I need trouble your Lordships. I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment moved—

"That this clause be there inserted."—(The Marquess of Londonderry).

THE ACTING CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, I think it would be right for me to say a few words as to the reason which has induced me to insist that this Amendment should be moved in the House rather than be put in before me when presiding over an Unopposed Bill Committee. One of the clauses in this Bill provides for the running by the Great Eastern Railway Company of certain motor-car services supplemental to the services on the railway, and though this proposal is novel, I believe that it will be, generally speaking, a convenience to the public in those parts of the country where it is found suitable to adopt it. It will be mostly with the object of meeting the requirements of excursionists and others, and it will be very often only an intermittent service. But in consequence of this power being taken by the Great Eastern Railway Company, the Postmaster-General suggested to me, through one of the officers of his Department, that the provisions of the Act of 1893 should be extended to this Bill, and that it should be made compulsory upon companies, and this company amongst them, when providing motor services to carry in those vehicles the mails and the servants of the Post Office in charge of them. That was proposed as a compulsory obligation. It is, as your Lordships know, compulsory now upon the railway companies to carry mails and servants of the Post Office either upon their ordinary trains or upon their light railways or tramways.

The company in question contested the justice of making the Act of 1893 apply to motor-car services of railway companies upon the ground that the circumstances were essentially different.

They were seeking for no monopoly, they were not laying down special tracks or getting Parliamentary powers to make roads; they were simply, as members of the public, using the roads which were provided by the community, and they argued that the only object of Clause 41 of the Bill—the clause now before your Lordships—was to legalise their doing a thing which they wanted to do in the interests of the company. I took that view, and I told the Postmaster-General that, in my opinion, if he wanted legislation of this kind it should be by a public Act, and not by making a precedent in what was otherwise an unopposed Bill.

I took that view mainly on the ground that the motor-car service which it is proposed to establish is essentially different from the general service of trains, inasmuch as there is not the same accommodation, certainly not the same accommodation to spare. Secondly, there is no monopoly given to the railway company for this service, and under those general conditions under which this traffic is carried on the granting to the Postmaster-General of this compulsory power might be placing a very unfair burden on the railway company. On these grounds I refused to insert the clause, but the railway company and the Post Office, I will not say behind my back, but after the decision I had given, agreed between themselves that the clause which is now before your Lordships—an agreement clause—should be inserted in this Bill. I then said that I thought, as this was the first occasion that such a proposal had been made, it should not be accepted by me even though it was agreed to by the parties, but should be moved in the House so that your Lordships should know what was done.

I do not offer any objection to the insertion of this clause, but I think your Lordships will agree with me that when a new precedent of this kind is made it should be done on due notice, so that the whole House may know what is being done. I do not altogether agree with some of the statements made by the noble Marquess. He stated that the Post Office had undoubtedly power to insist on this service under the existing law. It is precisely because they have not that power that they are seeking the insertion of this clause. All I wish to say is that as this is an agreement clause it must not, of course, be taken to form a precedent to be compulsorily imposed on all railway companies who come to Parliament for these services. As the clause in question is an agreement clause and the House has had an opportunity of considering it, I do not propose to offer on this occasion any opposition to the Amendment.

On Question, Amendment agreed to; Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

STAFF APPOINTMENTS.

LORD HENEAGE rose to call attention to the present Army Regulations in regard to staff and extra-regimental duties, the non-seconding of officers above the rank of captain in the artillery and cavalry, and the retention of officers in successive appointments on the staff for unlimited periods; and to move to resolve: "That, in the opinion of this House, the present system limits the number of officers duly qualified for staff appointments, is most unfair to regimental officers, and is prejudicial to the best interests of the Army." He said: My Lords, in bringing this question again before the attention of your Lordships I do not propose to retraverse the whole ground, because the late Under-Secretary of State for War, in reply to me last year, did not attempt to answer any of the statements I then made, but simply entered a non possumus attitude on the part of the Secretary of State. I intend to-day to call your Lordships' attention to the very unsatisfactory reply given me last year, and which was entirely based on erroneous facts and figures. The questions which I asked your Lordships to consider last year were whether it was not advisable (1) that more officers should be allowed to pass through the Staff College for shorter periods; (2) that all officers on the staff should be seconded, especially in the cavalry and artillery, and (3) that there should be more frequent interchange of duties between regiments and the staff.

Now, my Lords, what was the reply that I received from the noble Earl, Lord Hardwicke, last year? He first of all said that as the whole Staff College question was under Sir Henry Hildyard's consideration he could say nothing, and I admit that that was a perfectly fair and reasonable reply. He then went on to say that they could not increase the number of staff officers as they would not have staff employment for them, and that though my Motion would, in the opinion of the military advisers of the War Office, very much increase the efficiency and discipline of the Army, the cost rendered it prohibitive. Now, my Lords, I desire to call your attention to facts and figures, all of which ought to have been known to the War Office at that time. First, I will deal with the question of the increase in the number of staff officers. The evidence of Lord Roberts and of other generals before the War Commission proved clearly three facts:—(1) That there were not sufficient staff officers; (2) that whilst some were efficient others did not know their work; and (3) that the regimental officers who were commandeered for the staff did their work very well, soon became efficient and were in no degree inferior to the general body of Staff College men. That, I think, is a very strong argument in favour of a greater interchange between the regiments and the staff, and of a larger number of officers being passed through the Staff College to qualify for staff work.

The Royal Commission considered the evidence of Lord Roberts of such importance that in Paragraph 95 of their Report, page 53, they gave his evidence textually. They state that after referring to an absence of a definite system of staff duties, leading sometimes to neglect of indispensable precautions, the gallant Field-Marshal went on to say that—

> "Officers were often called upon to take up duties of which they had no previous knowledge; but whilst it was remarkable in the great majority of cases how quickly they became efficient, the mistakes that were made by the staff had most serious consequences. Many instances of indifferent staff work might be quoted, and it seems clear that the whole staff should be thoroughly trained, that a definite system of carrying out staff duties should be laid dawn, and that we should have enough trained staff officers to supply, in case of emergency, a large Army."

That was precisely what I asked for in my Motion last year. The noble and gallant Field-Marshal went on to say—

"Staff officers cannot be improvised, nor can they learn their duties like the rank and file in a few weeks or months, for their duties are as varied as they are important."

And the noble and gallant Earl further said—

I am decidedly of opinion that we cannot have a first-rate Army unless we have a first-rate staff, well educated, constantly practised in manœuvres, and with wide experience."

This was supplemented by Lord Kitchener, who said—

"The officers on the staff were very mixed. Some were excellent, whilst others had no staff training and had everything to learn. There was no reserve of qualified staff officers to fill vacancies."

Now, my Lords, I will only quote one more passage from the evidence of Lord Roberts. It is in reference to regimental officers, who have come in for so much unmerited censure, and his opinion is amply endorsed by other general officers. Lord Roberts said—

"There were certain failures among them in South Africa, but, so far as my knowledge of history goes, the general standard of practical knowledge, of devotion to duty, and of readiness under difficulties, was at least as high as in any army which I have known or of which I have read . . . It was seldom that they displayed any want of initiation, and their knowledge of their duties in the field left little to be desired."

It requires no further words from me, after these quotations, to urge the importance of more staff officers; but I would further point out that both Lord Roberts and General Nicholson represented that there was no adequate body of staff officers trained in the work of intelligence, study of country, strategical or tactical dispositions, direction of movements of troops, choice of camps, water, and sanitary matters. I think your Lordships will agree with me and also with these gallant officers that these are matters of the highest importance, and matters that ought not to be left to be learnt after an Army is in the field.

I think it is clear, from what I have read to your Lordships, that more staff officers are required, and that, if given the opportunity, the general body of regimental officers would qualify for the staff. Why not give the opportunity to all those recommended, without competitive examinations, for one year's training in the Staff College, or even six months? There are many staff duties which do not require exceptional ability in languages or strategy. At the end of the year let there be a competitive examination, and retain specially good men for a second year. I will not trouble the House with any arguments as to unlimited service on the staff. It has become a by-word that staff officers once on the staff were always on the staff, notwithstanding the regulation that every officer was to go back to his regiment at the end of his five years term of service. But recently, during the period when Lord Roberts was Commander-in-Chief, I understand a new Order was issued enforcing that regulation, and, I believe, in many cases limiting the staff appointments to a term of three years. This will promote a greater interchange between the staff and regiments to the advantage of both and give more officers the opportunity of staff service and of becoming efficient.

Now, I come to the question of seconding, and to the reply which was given me last year by the noble Earl the then Under-Secretary that it would increase efficiency and discipline but that the cost was too great and the money could be better expended in other ways. I would venture to ask your Lordships in what better way can money be expended than in promoting the discipline and efficiency of our Army? Notwithstanding the non possumus attitude taken up by the Under-Secretary last year, events have marched along with very rapid strides, and the position is much altered. A new Order has been issued to the effect that officers joining the Staff College shall be seconded, and that commanding officers of regiments and seconds-in-command shall not go to the staff unless they resign their regimental appointments. Again, I am told that within the last few weeks it has been decided that artillery battery majors in future are to be seconded when employed on the staff; so that the only officers who will now be left unseconded if they serve on the staff will be majors commanding cavalry squadrons. I ask why, when justice has been done to all the other majors, justice should not be done to majors commanding squadrons of cavalry?

There were during the war, and there are even at the present moment, large numbers of captains commanding cavalry squadrons who have never had major's rank or major's pay. At the time when Mr. Childers was Secretary of State for War there was a great change made in the cavalry. Up to that time the troop system had obtained in those regiments, with a captain and two subalterns, whilst the colonel, adjutant, and riding master bossed the show. But Mr. Childers brought about the squadron system. When that system was adopted, it was decided that the squadron should be under a major with a captain and three subalterns, and Mr. Childers considered that the officer commanding a cavalry squadron should have the rank, as he had the responsibilities, of a major. The major of a cavalry squadron is practically the commanding officer of his squadron, with an appeal to the colonel. He is entirely responsible for the pay, drill, mounting, uniform of men, saddlery, discipline, leave of men, and recommendations for promotion, and he is responsible to the colonel and to no one else for the efficiency of his squadron. Therefore, when a squadron major is taken away and placed upon the staff, a captain has to perform all those duties and take all those responsibilities without the rank or the pay of major.

It is a very small question at the present moment, but I would mention that when a major is removed to the staff he gets his pay practically doubled. He has sometimes under £300 a year as a regimental major, but he gets from £600 to £700 a year the moment he goes on the staff. A staff captain receives £500 a year, but the captain who undertakes all the responsibilities of the major when the major is put on the staff only receives the pay he had before. The War Office and the late Commander-in-Chief have done a great deal to promote justice in regard to this matter, and I would ask the authorities, having swallowed the camel, not to strain at the gnat.

I have been careful to look through the number of officers who would be affected at the present moment if justice was done in this matter, and I find that it is only a question of a dozen captains, and the difference of pay, 2s. a day, would only amount to £36 10s. per annum. The sum of £500 would pay the lot and give them major's rank. I do not say that there are not more than a dozen majors on the staff, but the other majors are either students at the Staff College, in colonial employ, or they are majors who have been allowed to continue as adjutants of Yeomanry after they have been promoted, and, therefore, they do not come within the same category. Nor do I include vacancies of those who are seconded, but whose places are not filled. Those I have deducted. I conclude by moving my Resolution and asking the noble Earl the Under-Secretary of State for War whether he can give the House any information with regard to the new Staff College regulations, with regard to the new rule about staff service and whether it is to be enforced, and with regard to the seconding of officers on the staff; and I would express the hope that since justice has been done to the artillery it will not now be withheld from cavalry captains in a like position.

Moved to resolve, "That, in the opinion of this House the present Army Regulations in regard to staff and extra-regimental duties, the non-seconding of officers above the rank of captain in the artillery and cavalry, and the retention of officers in successive appointments on the staff for unlimited periods limits the number of officers duly qualified for staff appointments, are most unfair to regimental officers, and are prejudicial to the best interests of the Army."—(Lord Heneage.)

LORD LOVAT: My Lords, I desire to associate myself with the remarks which have fallen from the noble Lord who has just sat down, and, with your Lordships' permission, I would particularly like to point out the great deficiency in the trained staff of our Army as at present constituted. The fact is again brought to our minds that the War Office does not march with the times. Five years ago few, I think, would have suspected the latent power which lay in our Auxiliary Forces and in the untrained patriotic thousands in the country. There is hardly a Minister, to whatever Party he may belong, who, in after dinner speeches, has not congratulated the country on its extraordinary patriotism, but only one Minister has taken any trouble to see that that patriotism, if it is to be called upon again, is directed on proper lines. I refer to Mr. Brodrick. He is the only man who has brought forward a really workable scheme.

We in England have the smallest Regular Army of any European nation, but there is the certainty that if we called upon them we should have probably the largest number of Volunteers which any nation in Europe could produce. Yet we have got no means of working this body into anything which could be called an Army. We are in that position because we have no adequate staff. May I point out the actual number of trained staff officers we have in England at the present time. I am not including those who are already employed, nor those who are at the present moment in service abroad; neither am I including those who are first or second in command of their battalions, because they could not be taken away without seriously interfering with the efficiency of their regiments. In respect to the cavalry we have only two officers who are free, so to speak, to do staff work. We have on paper one cavalry brigade. The second cavalry brigade is on paper, but there are no names below it. Therefore, we should start, if we filled this second cavalry brigade, with a deficiency of cavalry staff officers. Again, when we come to the infantry, we have only seventeen majors and captains who are qualified —that is to say, we have only two officers in the cavalry and seventeen in the infantry who are ready at the present moment to take up staff appointments, and this at a time when we ought to have thoroughly learned the lesson taught by the late war.

The inequality of the staff work in South Africa, as pointed out by many witnesses who gave evidence before Lord Elgin's Commission, arose from the fact that the majority of these officers were taken direct from the regiments without any staff education. We all know that before two divisions had left these islands for South Africa the Staff College men had run out. Messengers were sent to various regiments asking them to supply staff officers, and the officers supplied were sent at once to the front. What happened? The staff work was most inefficient at times of utmost crisis, and the work of the Army throughout was seriously hampered. I would like to point out the hardships which occur in regiments whose officers are taken away in time of war. A regimental commanding officer is ordered to send out a couple of captains or majors for staff work. Naturally he does not send his best men, because he cannot afford to lose them. He sends in all probability the worst officers in the whole of his corps; but when these men return to their regiments, although they are not the best officers and were sent to the staff on that account, they will be for all time above the heads of better men and above the very men who were not sent to the staff because they were better men. That is not justice, and it spoils the work done by the brigade, because the second-class or third-class men sent by the regimental commanding officer for staff work are not up to their duties.

It is a well-known theory, laid down by Moltke and other writers on the subject of military work, that it is essential to have some consecutive pattern of ideas for staff work; but this is quite impossible if you get men in this haphazard manner. Now, with regard to the Auxilary Forces. The Imperial Yeomanry have two majors upon whom they can rely for the whole of their staff work. They had a captain a short time ago, but, unfortunately, he has gone to learn Japanese and has had to be struck off the list; so that at present there are only two staff officers for the whole of the Yeomanry—some 25,000 or 27,000 men. We cannot have our own Yeomanry officers for staff duties because they have not the knowledge. I command a Yeomanry unit, but I should not dream of sending one of my best officers away. It is unreasonable to expect us to do so simply because they do not take care at the War Office to have these things arranged in readiness for mobilisation in time of war.

With regard to the Militia, we know that a large number of the junior officers are merely birds of passage, who only come in for a short time. It would be impossible for a Militia colonel to part with his senior officers. The discipline of the Militia is not such as to enable it to stand much knocking about. We had during the war orders and counter-orders. That may be all right in the case of Regular troops, but Volunteers will not allow themselves to be messed about by men who do not know their work. I certainly think Mr. Brodrick's Army Corps scheme was a good one. It gave us a skeleton on which we could graft our various battalions, and in dropping that scheme we have, in my opinion, gone back. This scheme could only come into force if we had more staff officers. We have not got a sufficient staff, and surely now is the time to remedy that deficiency. Previously when the War Office took men for the Staff College they took them more or less in the dark, and were only able to judge of their capacity as the result of an examination, but here we are at the end of a war. We know who are the good men and who are the bad men; we know who were good staff officers in South Africa and who were bad staff officers. Surely now is the time to get hold of them, and to put them through the Staff College.

Why should we not at the present moment put 100 or 150 officers through the Staff College? They could be given one year's course, as the noble Lord who preceded me suggested, and this large number of trained men would constitute a reserve of staff officers on which you could rely in the event of mobilisation. The argument against this increase of staff officers is one of cost. Could anyone imagine that this cost, if ever we had a war again like we had in South Africa, would not be recovered over and over again if we had efficient staff work? You have only to read the Report of Lord Elgin's Commission to see how money was thrown away broadcast through inefficient staff work in South Africa. I think the extra cost of educating more men at the Staff College ought not to weigh at all in considering this matter. With regard to the argument that there will not be sufficient employment for them, I would say that you want, in the first place, to get your staff in touch with the Auxiliary Forces. The whole question of concentration at a critical point is entirely a matter of the close study of distances, and the time that men will take to travel over distances; and if you have not got a staff capable of calculating this, how can any general be expected to do well or to get his men at critical points at the right time? Therefore, I think that if the principle of extra staff officers is admitted there would be plenty of work for them to do. They could be attached to the infantry and Yeomanry brigades, and would be most valuable in bringing the troops up to a greater state of efficiency.

Of course, a very large proportion of the staff, in case of mobilisation, will have to come from the Auxiliary Forces, but I think it will be admitted that it is absolutely essential that, at all events, a nucleus of a staff, as given by Mr. Brodrick's Army Corps scheme, should be there to point out the lines on which the Auxiliary staff would be able to work. There were at the end of the war three great lines of reform, and I venture to think this one of staff is quite equal to the other two. First of all, there was reform of the War Office, which His Majesty's Government have gone into in no half-hearted manner. Secondly, there was the question of the training of officers, which they have gone into by the appointment of an Education Committee; and, thirdly, they have this great question of the staff. I hope that His Majesty's Government will see their way to obtain a reserve of staff officers, so that if the nation has to fight again and to produce 300,000 men for defence, we shall at all events have some nucleus of a Staff who can be relied upon to educate the staff officers from the Auxiliary Forces who they will have to help them.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Earl of DONOUGHMORE): My Lords, the noble Lord who initiated this discussion made one general observation with which I should like to deal at once. It was to the effect that the figures produced by my noble friend behind me last year were entirely erroneous. I should have been very interested to know in what particular they were erroneous. I have still those figures. They were, I am sure, most carefully worked out at the War Office at the time, and I have not seen or heard any statement by the noble Lord seriously impugning them. We have a body of trained actuaries at the War Office whose one business it is to make calculations of this kind, and I think that without some very strong proof it is rather a sweeping statement to make to say off-hand that the calculations were inaccurate.

LORD HENEAGE: I took exception to the figures immediately after the noble Earl's speech. A great number of other subjects were brought in to make up the amounts which had nothing whatever to do with the pay of cavalry majors.

*THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: I have read last year's debates carefully, and the impression I got was that the noble Lord did not make it clear on the first occasion that he was not considering the case of all majors.

LORD HENEAGE: My Question was on the Paper, and it distinctly stated that I was only dealing with cavalry and artillery majors.

*THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: I am quite prepared to accept that. The figures given by my noble friend Lord Hardwicke did include the infantry and my noble friend opposite did not, I think, say anything at that time which would convey the impression that he meant to exclude the infantry. But he did say a few days afterwards that that was his intention, and my noble friend then corrected the figures he gave on the first occasion. The noble Lord, in raising this question to-night, suggested a scheme by which we should take a larger number of men into the Staff College for one year and a smaller number for the two years course. I admit at once that that is a very alluring proposal; but the difficulty in the way is a practical one. The course at the Staff College is very carefully thought out, and that for the first year is very different from the course in the second. It is a different style of thing altogether. The first year's course deals with military history, artillery, and fortification, staff duties, military administration, and other subjects. The second year's course goes into bigger questions, what I might call general staff questions—questions of Imperial defence, practice in reconnaissance, practice in training of troops, and tours of inspection—and it is quite impossible to tell at the end of the first year whether a man will be any use at the things he is going to study in the second year until after he has entered on the second year's course. It would make things very much easier to pass a larger number of men through the one year course and a smaller number through the full two years; but I am afraid the system would not benefit the Army in the end, and we might lose the services of many men who might not be so good at the work in the first year, but who might turn out useful staff officers in general staff work.

I am entirely at one with the two noble Lords who have spoken as to the necessity of more staff officers for the Army; and I am glad to see that they recognise that the Staff College training is absolutely necessary in order to turn out efficient staff officers. The output of staff officers at the present moment is not anything like large enough for our requirements. Our requirements are growing every day. It is not quite germane to the subject, but it may interest your Lordships to know that in the organisation of the General Staff at the War Office we intend to employ sixty-five officers to do the work that has hitherto been done by thirty-two. That at once creates a large number of staff appointments of very great importance, for which we have got to find the very best candidates. In the Intelligence Branch, which is now under the Director of Military Operations, and in which we have hitherto employed twenty-seven officers, we shall find plenty of work for forty-three, and the remainder will be employed in the other branches of the department performing work for which only a very small staff has hitherto existed. This fact alone has vastly added to the necessity for turning out more staff officers, and we are fully alive to the fact that we have to meet these necessities.

Lord Tweedmouth made some strong remarks the other day as to the Government's unsettled convictions in this matter. He said that we were unable to make up our minds as to the reforms recommended by the Esher Committee. The noble Lord displayed an innocence of knowlege which did him infinite credit, but I think the statement I have made will convince him that we are not moving so slowly as the outside world seems to imagine, because we do not always talk about what we are doing. With regard to the suggestion that we should enlarge nomination and pass a great many more men through the Staff College, I would point out that our experience is against too great an extension of the system of nomination. The late Commandant at the Staff College has said that when a limited number of officers were selected by nomination it was frequently found that amongst them were some of the best officers of the College, but that when a large number were selected it resulted in the whole falling below the normal. We are fully alive to the need for further staff officers, and the matter is being most seriously considered. Your Lordships have no doubt read the recent Army Order issued by Lord Kitchener. You will see that Lord Kitchener is contemplating the establishment of a Staff College in India; this matter is now the subject of discussion between the War Office and the India Office, and I hope a decision will be come to at an early date.

Now I come to the second point raised by Lord Heneage, as to the non-seconding of officers above the rank of captain in the artillery and cavalry. The noble Lord does not include the infantry, and, therefore, I will say nothing about them beyond stating that the case for the non-inclusion of the infantry is very strong. It has been decided that artillery majors extra-regimentally employed are to be seconded, that is to say, they are to be succeeded in their appointments by majors. The first objection of the noble Lord's therefore falls to the ground. The noble Lord's point I think is that an artillery major commands a unit — a battery — and therefore ought to be seconded on going to the staff, and that a cavalry major commands a unit—a squadron—and ought therefore to be also seconded. I should like to say first that it would be much more difficult to work in the cavalry with small regiments than in the artillery where there are a lot of officers. There are 1,100 officers in the the Horse and Field Artillery, and 900 in the Garrison Artillery. We cannot recognise that a squadron is exactly the same unit as a battery. The squadron is a third of the cavalry regiment, and the regiment is commanded by a colonel who has authority over the majors, which does not exist in the case of the artillery.

It is true, as the noble Lord has said, that since 1887 the major commands the squadron, and that since that year his authority as squadron commander has been to a certain extent increased. In 1897, however, we added sixteen majors to the cavalry, with the result that promotion already in the cavalry is faster than it is in any other branch, and any alteration in the direction which the noble Lord suggested might very reasonably be argued to be unfair to the officers in other branches of the service. I now come to a point on which I really do lay stress. It is this, that we do now want the squadron majors away from their regiments and on the staff. We recognise that they are approaching the time when they will have to command the regiment, and we do not wish to encourage them to go away on the staff during those years. We want them to remain and get fully in touch with their regiments preparatory to assuming command a few years later. That is our great objection to seconding. There is a contention at the back of this that it is unfair that while the major is away the captain should do his work and not get full major's rank and pay.

Lord HENEAGE: That is my whole point.

*The Earl of DONOUGHMORE: My first answer to that is that we do all we can to prevent the majors going away, and the second is that though, in some cases, it may cause hardship, it is not an unknown thing in other walks of life for men to do the work of a higher post while occupying the lower one. Officers are glad of the opportunity of showing that they are capable of doing the higher work, and at the same time they gain experience which is bound to be of use to them in their future career. I do not wish to pretend that that entirely does away with any hardship, but, if I may use the expression, it materially gilds the pill. In conclusion, I would only repeat that the reason we cannot meet the noble Lord on this point is that we do claim that the main cavalry unit is the regiment and not the squadron.

I entirely agree with the noble Lord that after a period of staff service the officers should return to their regiments. There is an unwritten law at the War Office to this effect, and I have made careful inquiries and find that it is strictly enforced. There have, however, been exceptions during the last few years, but they were cases in which it was to the advantage of the Army that exceptions should be made; and although exceptions are always unpleasant things, we must have a free hand sometimes to dispense with rules. I can assure the noble Lord that there are no two opinions at the War Office that this rule ought to be enforced in every case where it is possible. I hope I have shown that in the main I am not antagonistic to the noble Lord, and I trust that in the circumstances he will not find it necessary to press his Motion to a division.

LORD HENEAGE: My Lords, I shall be very glad to withdraw my Motion after what I think is a very satisfactory explanation given by the noble Earl. I do not wish to say anything more with regard to the erroneous figures than that a lot of other calculations connected with the infantry were brought in last year by the noble Earl which largely increased the amount. With regard to the seconding of cavalry officers, I did not base my argument entirely on the question of a cavalry squadron being a unit. I do not see why cavalry majors should be the only majors in the whole service who are not seconded when they go away for staff work.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, I do not intend to rise to the fly thrown by the noble Earl the Under-Secretary and to state my opinions as to the convictions, settled or otherwise, of His Majesty's Government. But, plausible as the speech of the noble Earl was, he entirely failed to touch upon the most important point raised by the noble and gallant Lord behind me, Lord Lovat. My noble friend pointed out, I thought with great force, that from the fact of our having been at war for three years the War Office had attained very good and complete knowledge of the relative merits of the men who served on the staff throughout that long campaign—a campaign that involved the employment of a large number of men on the staff and a continual shifting of those men. The point my noble and gallant friend urged was this, that having got this information the War Office should make use of it, and not allow to drop back into obscurity those men who had proved themselves good staff officers Whatever arrangements may be made for securing a sufficient supply of men to serve in His Majesty's Army, we are obliged to keep ready a set of officers capable of taking charge of the men who come forward; and it does seem to me that we have a right to ask from His Majesty's Government some more definite answer than the Under-Secretary has given on the points raised by Lord Lovat. Most people who take any interest in the fortunes of the British Army recognise that a good supply of the very best class of officers, instructed in the latest methods of warfare, brought up to the highest state of efficiency, is one of the most pressing needs of the country. I hope His Majesty's Government will take note of my noble and gallant friend's speech, and may even now tell us they have ready at hand, some scheme for dealing with his suggestions.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

NAVAL INTERPRETERS.

*__LORD ELLENBOROUGH__: My Lords, I rise to call the attention of the House to the fact that, according to the June Navy List, out of 123 naval interpreters only two officers on the executive list have passed in Russian, that the only executive officer who has passed in German is on the Reserve List, that no officer of any branch of the Naval Service has passed in Japanese; and to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will consider the advisability of giving a certain number of selected officers further facilities and inducements for the study of the German, Russian, and Japanese languages; also to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many of the 123 officers who have passed as interpreters, and how many of the eighteen executive officers who have passed as French interpreters, are in receipt of the extra allowances payable to naval interpreters.

According to the June Navy List there are 123 officers in different branches of the service who have passed as interpreters in various languages. Sixteen of these have passed in German, and eight in Russian. But although fifty-five have passed in Oriental languages, not a single officer of any branch of the service has yet passed in Japanese. But what is still more extraordinary is that not one of the sixteen officers who have passed in German is on the regular executive list. Lieutenant Simpson-Baikie, who has passed in that language, is an officer in the Merchant Service and is on the list of the Royal Navy Reserve. Thirty-seven officers have passed in French, of whom eighteen are on the executive list. Surely the French Navy is not eighteen times as important as the German? From the little that I know about the latter service, I consider that its methods are worthy of the most careful study. Yet such studies can scarcely be undertaken except by those who, in addition to a knowledge of the language, are well acquainted with technical details, with the manœuvres of fleets, and who have done duty on the bridge. If we were acting in alliance with the German Navy we should not be able to derive the full benefit of such an alliance, as more than a usual number of misunderstandings would take place.

I am, however, glad to see that eight Marine officers, one Engineer officer, and six officers of other branches of the service have passed in German. Executive officers have less leisure than those in other branches, are more likely to be disturbed at odd hours, and have had in consequence fewer opportunities. Of the eight officers who passed in Russian, only two—Commander Kemp and Lieutenant Duncan—are on the active list of executive officers. Naval men have not neglected the Oriental languages, for I find that eight have passed in Persian, nine in Arabic, twenty-eight in Hindostani, twenty-four in Swahili, and two in Chinese. Yet no officer of any branch of the service has passed in Japanese, though one has passed in Chinook. I heartily congratulate the noble Earl on the addition he has lately made to the number of officers employed in the Intelligence Department, and though I have no doubt that that department is carefully studying the war in the East, still I consider that this ignorance of the languages of naval Powers of importance may be the cause of mistaken expenditure in time of peace, and a source of danger to the State in time of war.

Every naval officer is now studying the Russo-Japanese War. To do this thoroughly he must have translations before him. The ordinary civilian writer will not help him much. The translator must have technical as well as literary knowledge. The tactical arrangements of the Japanese, the means they have adopted to protect their convoys, how they make use of the secondary and improvised bases, such as the Elliott Islands, and how they repair most of their ships without sending them back to Japan, should be thoroughly studied by officers acquainted with their language. The systems used on both sides as regards telegraphy, wireless or otherwise, the methods of laying down and removing anchored explosives, of blocking and clearing the entrances of harbours, the details of the fittings of turrets and gun-carriages, the sighting of guns both for day and night firing, the plans adopted for torpedo attack and defence, and how far original fittings have had to be discarded or altered under the stress of actual warfare, are also well worthy of attention. I am aware that a large number of both Russian and Japanese officers are acquainted with our language, but that is not quite the same thing as our officers knowing theirs. We require officers with technical knowledge, able to translate whatever either side may publish. At the close of the war we may expect to find that a great deal of literature is available if we are prepared to take advantage of it. Unsuccessful or superseded officers will find some means of defending themselves, even in countries where the Press is muzzled.

At the close of the Franco-German conflict a large number of our military officers undertook the study of French and German for the sole purpose of being able to master the details of that struggle. Until the conditions of war had been altered by improvements in the weapons, I do not think that they could have employed their time better. While the Russians and Japanese are fighting, some of our executive officers ought to be studying their languages, so as to be able to take advantage of their experience directly the war is over. In the next great struggle for the supremacy of the seas, our success or failure may depend upon our having rightly read the lessons of the Russo-Japanese War.

I will give your Lordships an instance of the foresight of the Japanese themselves, as regards this very question of learning languages. In 1858 Lord Elgin made a treaty with Japan, and several ports were it consequence opened to the British. In 1859 I was on board the ship that brought the British Consul to Hakodadi. To our astonishment, shortly after we had anchored, a letter, written in English by the Governor of Hakodadi, was handed to our captain. It was on foolscap, in exact conformity with our Admiralty rules and regulations for correspondence, but written with a paint brush instead of a pen. There were only two slight mistakes in it, which might have escaped notice had it not been carefully examined. The Governor of Hakodadi had been told off to learn English because his harbour was about to become a treaty port, and I hope that the noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty will at once tell off a few of our executive officers to learn German, Russian, and Japanese.

I am not at all an advocate of making languages compulsory throughout the whole of the service. Some officers have a facility for learning languages, others have not. The latter will be better employed in learning something else. But when a man has learnt another language besides his own he learns a second foreign language with much greater facility. On Monday last an excellent circular was issued by the Admiralty which goes far towards meeting the necessities of the case. It greatly increases both the facilities and the inducements for learning foreign languages. For instance, the number of officers who are to be allowed to study languages while on full pay is to be increased from ten to twenty. I think that that number may be a normal one. But we have great arrears to make up, and as the necessity for a proper study of the Russian and Japanese languages is immediate, I would suggest to the noble Earl that it would be desirable that executive officers studying the German, Russian, and Japanese languages should be considered as additional to the limit of twenty, until at least twelve of them have passed in each language. We ought to have a minimum of interpreters in certain tongues.

I hope the Treasury will not object to the slight additional expense that will be incurred if my suggestion is adopted. Taking the difference between full and half pay at an average of 8s. a day for the various ranks, the extra charge for thirty-four officers would amount to less than £5,000 a year, for one year only. I put the number at thirty-four, because we have already two executive officers who have passed in Russian. It is false economy to employ an insufficient number of officers to criticise this war. Next year millions will be spent on the Navy. Whether they are rightly or wrongly spent depends entirely as to whether we shall have learnt aright the lessons to be derived from it or not. The £5,000 that I ask for is a trifle as compared with the expense of our autumn manœuvres, and there is far more to be learnt from a real war than from any manœuvres. During manœuvres the complaint is constantly made that in a real war the result would have been different. But when a ship is put out of action by being sunk in battle, there is no use in complaining of the rules, or of the stupidity or partiality of an umpire. There is no getting over the fact that she has been put out of action in accordance with the stern realities of war.

There is another point in the circular to which I wish to draw attention. I regret to see that technical terms do not form part of the lower standard for Japanese. In the higher standard it is stated that some acquaintance with terms used in the naval service will be required. I have great doubts if one year is sufficient to allow for the study of Japanese. But if the Admiralty set twelve officers to commence their studies at once we shall be more certain about that in twelve months time. The candidate should certainly be made to translate a few pages from a gunnery book, and from text books on steam and torpedoes. Exact knowledge of the construction of sentences in Russian and Japanese classical works may be safely left to the gentlemen of the Foreign Office, who have to interpret treaties and protocols, and who are not expected to be naval interpreters. The exact construction of a gun or of a torpedo is of more importance to naval officers than the construction of a complicated sentence.

I have the liveliest recollection of the first time that I ever acted as a naval interpreter. I was a naval cadet on board one of our three-deckers which touched at Brest for coal when on her way back from the Crimea. The master —that is, the navigating officer—told me to tell the French officer in charge of the moorings that he was going to get a hauling-line out of the starboard hawse-hole so as to be able to bouse in the bight of his cable. I know that many of your Lordships are well acquainted with the French language, but I doubt if even the noble Marquess at the head of the Foreign Office would be able to translate such a sentence at short notice. Ten years later I passed in French as naval interpreter. Had our parts been reversed I should certainly have rejected my examiner. He was a French Professor utterly ignorant of any technical terms. The question arises in my mind as to how far the Civil Service Commissioners are competent to examine officers in nautical terms. The term "maritime idiom" which appears in the circular is very vague. It appears in a former circular, in which 100 marks out of 1,200 are assigned to it, but I have no recollection of seeing it in any other document. It has been supposed by some persons to include words that are unfortunately still occasionally made use of by some nautical men when suffering from impatience. Whether this be so or not, I should suggest that in future out of the 1,200 numbers mentioned in the circular seventy-five numbers should be given for nautical terms, seventy-five for words used in steam, and seventy-five for words used in gunnery and torpedo work; and I further think that the Civil Service Commissioners would do well to call in nautical experts to assist them at these examinations. I have alluded to these matters because I am afraid that if the literary and grammatical standards are placed too high, officers may be deterred from studying these languages.

What I suggest to the First Lord is that, while retaining a high technical standard, he should lower the literary standard required for Russian and Japanese interpreterships, and that he should give even more special facilities for the study of those languages, until we have at least twelve executive officers who have passed in each of them. The second part of my Question has been put because, hitherto, officers who have qualified as interpreters have been much discouraged by not receiving the pay that they considered to be due to them, on the plea that they had not been specially appointed as interpreters. But as the schedule attached to this circular says that—and that an interpreter in French and German will be allowed in each ship carrying midshipmen, I hope that in future that grievance may be considered remedied.

I heartily congratulate the noble Earl on his recent circular, which is, I think, well calculated to deal with the normal state of the Navy, when the arrears that I have referred to have been worked up. But I hope that he will ask the Treasury for that extra £5,000 and that he will at once appoint a number of officers to study the three languages I have referred to. It is a matter that might well be brought before the Committee for National Defence. I shall conclude by asking a favour of the First Lord of the Admiralty. When a person is suddenly surprised by being asked to do something unexpected and to pay some money, his first impulse is to say, no. I would therefore ask the noble Earl not to give a definite reply to my request for £5,000 and thirty-six interpreters at present, especially as I have given him no notice of it, but to think it over with his colleagues, and to consider the subject as an open one at present. I now put the Question that stands in my name.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: My Lords, before the First Lord of the Admiralty answers the Questions which have been put to him by the noble Lord who has just sat down, I should like to say a few words with regard to the difficulty which may exist in removing officers for a considerable time from their proper work. I am quite certain that no man can thoroughly acquire languages, especially those very difficult languages to which the noble Lord has referred, without sojourning abroad. He must mix with the natives of those countries before he can acquire the language in a conversational form; and what I wish to ask the noble Earl the First Lord is, whether he will consider the necessity of giving officers facilities for studying abroad, at the same time allowing them to retain their former position in the Service? By that I mean that no man should lose anything in consequence of his having remained abroad; he should not lose his chance, for instance, of commanding a ship because he had spent the requisite time abroad to make himself proficient in a particular language.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (The Earl of SELBORNE): My Lords, I am obliged to the noble Lord who brought this question forward for his kind words about myself, and I am very glad to be able to say what I think will not surprise your Lordships, that I agree with almost every word he has uttered. I do not pin myself to adhesion to exactly every detailed proposal he has made, but to the general spirit of his remarks I cordially adhere. This question of foreign languages has undoubtedly been sadly neglected in the Navy, and it is, I think, essential that there should be an adequate staff of officers of the executive as well as of the other branches who can speak all the important languages of the world if the Navy is in all respects to be equipped for its work in war and the study of its profession in peace. I can assure the noble Lord that the war now in progress is being most deeply studied by the Admiralty, both here and on the spot so far as the opportunities present themselves; and he will, I think, be glad to know that the first officers, in both cases a captain, attached to the Japanese and the Russian Fleets were both able to speak the language of the nation to which they were attached.

Although the number of officers in the Navy List who speak certain languages is meagre as analysed by the noble Lord, and although I agree with him that the general linguistic attainments of the Navy fall far short of what we desire, yet there are, as a matter of fact, a considerable number of officers who do speak foreign languages but who are not registered in the Navy List because they have never thought fit to endeavour to register themselves as interpreters.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH: They are afraid of the high literary standard, I expect.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: Not necessarily, I think. The officer who is at present attached to the Russian Fleet in the Far East is a captain who had spent a considerable time in Russia, and he speaks Russian, I believe, excellently, but he had never, for some reason I do not understand, registered himself as a qualified interpreter. The circular letter of the Admiralty to which the noble Lord has referred was issued last Monday, and therefore it is much too soon to say what its effect will be. The Board of Admiralty will naturally watch its working very carefuly, and I do not for a moment put it forward as our last word on the subject. If experience shows that changes in the regulations are necessary, and that the movement is not progressing fast enough, we shall be quite ready to endeavour to improve our machinery. The number of officers on the list of interpreters in the June Navy List is not 123, as quoted by the noble Lord, but 122—a correction of no importance; but of this number only twelve are appointed at the present moment as interpreters. Two of these are executive officers, and of them, one is an interpreter in French. Allowances are payable in the case of each officer appointed as interpreter to a ship.

That is the state of things which we find in existence. It is not the state of things which we hope will exist when the new regulations have been working for a year or two. In the last few years there has been such a dearth of lieutenants, owing to the expansion of the Fleet, that there really has been no possibility of giving them leave to study languages on the Continent. But the list is now so rapidly increasing that I hope we shall shortly have a margin. Perhaps those noble lords who have not seen the circular will allow me very briefly to recapitulate the principal points with which we have endeavoured to deal and to comment a little upon them. In the first place, the number of officers who are to be allowed to study abroad at any one time is increased to twenty; that does not mean twenty in the year, but that every day in the year there may be twenty officers studying abroad—a very different thing. They will be on full pay the whole time, and it will count as "service."

The full pay will also be granted without any condition as to subsequent qualification; that is to say, an officer will not go with the dread before him that he may fail in his examination and have to refund half his full pay. Whether he succeeds or fails he will get his full pay for the period he is studying abroad. The period during which study abroad on full pay will be allowed is regulated according to the language which the officer is studying. The reward of the successful officer is to take the form of a gratuity according to a scale, a distinction being drawn between officers who qualify in the higher standard and those who qualify in the lower standard. In the next place, the allowances to officers appointed hereafter as interpreters will be regulated according to the language or qualification. Officers on the list of interpreters will be required to requalify every five years, and for this purpose they will be allowed to go abroad to the country speaking the language in which they are qualified on one month's full pay, in order to prepare themselves for requalification. Again, officers who are qualified to give instruction in foreign languages to junior officers on board His Majesty's ships will receive 5s. for each lesson of one hour's duration, the number of lessons for which payment will be made being limited to four a week. That, of course, is in addition to their pay as interpreters.

The prizes to midshipmen who attain proficiency have been increased to the annual value of £130. That is, of course, with the object of encouraging midshipmen to keep up the language they may have learnt previous to entering the service, so that they may start with some knowledge when they go abroad to qualify as interpreters. With regard to the study of foreign languages at the new Royal Naval College at Osborne, I believe we shall do more there in respect of French and German than could be done through these regulations, or through any efforts made by officers at a later period of their career to learn French and German abroad. This is, perhaps, a rash thing to say in your Lordships' House, where the experience of public schools is so universal, but I do thoroughly believe that we are going to succeed at Osborne where the public schools have so notably failed. We are going to teach the boys French or German, or both, in a way which will enable them to make themselves understood in France or Germany, and to understand what Frenchmen and Germans say to them, and be competent to study any literature in those languages.

As regards Japanese, the arrangements in respect to that are quite special. In addition to the institution of a special scale in connection with the study of Japanese, we are going to appoint a Japanese teacher at Wei-hai-Wei. In normal times the China Fleet is constantly using Wei-hai-Wei as headquarters for months together, and a Japanese instructor will be stationed there, who will be at the service of any officers of the Fleet. Officers who are now holding appointments as interpreters or acting-interpreters under the old regulations will be allowed to retain their appointments until the expiration of the commission of the ship in which they are serving, and an interpreter qualified in French or German will be allowed to each ship which carries midshipmen. Candidates for these interpreterships will have the opportunity of being examined by the Civil Service Commissioners three times a year, in April, July, and October, and I think the noble Lord need not be anxious lest the Civil Service Commissioners should be incompetent to examine these officers in technical naval phraseology. After all, it is not a subject with which we are altogether unfamiliar. There is drawn up for the instruction of cadets on the "Britannia" as perfect a comparative table of French and English terminology as exists in the whole world, and what has been done in the case of French could be done in the case of other languages. At any rate, I can assure my noble friend that the importance of the special terminology will not be forgotten.

In this examination a thorough knowledge of the language selected by the candidates will be required, and he will be examined orally as well as by written papers. I do not think the noble Lord need be afraid lest the examination should degenerate into one purely of grammar. Of course, it is desired that these officers should have a real grasp of the language they are acquiring in every respect, but the main point to be aimed at is that the language should be an instrument which the officer can use from day to day in his rough service as a naval officer, and, therefore, that he should be able to understand it when it is spoken, and to speak it fluently, is of the utmost importance.

Perhaps your Lordships will allow me to quote the scale which has been drawn up. In respect of Japanese, an officer will be allowed to reside in Japan for twelve months on full pay for the higher standard, or six months for the lower, and, if he succeeds, he will receive a gratuity of £200 for the higher standard, or £100 for the lower standard, and his pay as interpreter will be 2s. 6d. per diem. In the case of Russian, the duration of residence abroad will be nine months for the higher stipend and six months for the lower; the gratuity on qualifying will be £150 and £75 respectively, and the additional pay whilst employed as interpreter, 2s. 6d. per diem. In the case of German, Dutch, and modern Greek, the duration of residence abroad will be six months for the higher standard and four months for the lower; the gratuity on qualifying, £70 and £35 respectively, and the additional pay whilst employed as interpreter, 2s. per diem. In the case of French, Italian, Spanish, and Portugese, the duration of residence abroad will be four months for the higher standard and three months for the lower; the gratuity on qualifying £50 and £25 respectively, and the additional pay whilst employed 1s.6d. per diem.

Noble Lords may think the period of four months in France very low, but it must, of course, be remembered that it is not expected that any officer will go to France with a complete ignorance of the language. The officers who will go are those who already have some knowledge of it, and when the cadets trained at Osborne are in the service they will be lieutenants who will really have had adequate instruction in the language already. I have only, in conclusion, to ask your Lordships to allow me to read the two concluding paragraphs of the circular, because they indicate exactly the point of view from which the Admiralty has studied this question—

> "In revising the regulations in the manner indicated my Lords have been influenced by a strong sense of the disadvantages attending the want of familiarity with foreign languages shown by officers of His Majesty's Navy, and of the importance of promoting among them a knowledge of the languages spoken by officers of foreign fleets, with whom friendly intercourse is of frequent occurrence. Their Lordships accordingly desire that these regulations may be made known generally in the Fleet, and it is their wish that officers should be encouraged to volunteer for study abroad in accordance with the provisions of the regulations.
> "It is further their Lordships hope that as the number of officers qualified to instruct in foreign languages increases, greater opportunities will be afforded to midshipmen to study foreign languages, especially French and German, while serving afloat. Advantage is to be taken, whenever possible, of the presence of a qualified instructor to form classes on board ship for this purpose."

The object for which naval officers should study foreign languages is not only to enable them to converse with the officers of those fleets when they meet them, but to enable them to study the naval literature and the literature generally of those countries; because, great as is, I hope, the field of study which the British Navy offers to the other navies of the world, I am quite sure there is not a single navy from which we cannot learn something ourselves if we study it adequately, and it is in that spirit that I believe and trust the officers of the Navy will approach all naval literature emanating from rival navies.

THE DE MORLEY BARONY.

*LORD HAWKESBURY: My Lords, I rise to ask the Lord Chancellor whether his attention has been called to the fact reported in the newspaper that the Judge of the City of London Court stated in Court that a suitor in that Court, a gentleman styling himself Lord de Morley, was a Peer of the Realm; and whether it was not the fact that the gentleman in question, who claims to be an heir or co-heir of that barony, has never had his claim considered by the Committee of Privileges, and therefore can have no cl im to be designated a Peer. I should, perhaps, state that the barony is quite a different one from that in respect of which my noble friend Lord De Mauley sits in this House, and the title is spelt in a different way. I may say that I have no wish to criticise the claim of this gentleman to the title, which may, or may not, prove to be a good one when it comes to be considered by the Committee of Privileges, but it does seem to me that a statement made by a Judge in Court in this manner is very likely to be misconstrued by persons who are not conversant with the practice of the Committee of Privileges and of your Lordships' House, for they may attach to it a weight and authority it does not possess, and it is for that reason, and knowing how rightly jealous your Lordships are of the dignity and privileges of this House, that I have ventured to call attention to this matter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I am sorry that I have not been able to verify the exact quotation from the learned Judge, chiefly because I suspect that he must have been misunderstood or misreported. It is probable that the learned Judge was endeavouring to disclaim, on the part of this gentleman, with whom he seemed to be acquainted, that he was a mere impostor, the phrase used apparently being that the gentleman was "by no means a bogus Peer." The Judge was evidently endeavouring to say that the gentleman was not claiming to be what he had no right to claim, but that he was a perfectly respectable gentleman. I believe that to be true; I know nothing against the gentleman. He appeared before me when I was presiding over the Court of Claims, and claimed to be a Peer, and I informed him that he must prove his case before the proper tribunal. No one can entertain any doubt as to the impropriety of a Judge, or anybody else, pronouncing judgment upon a matter which has not been heard, and which can only be heard by your Lordships' House. I think it extremely improbable, however, that the learned Judge actually used the words attributed to him, and that the misapprehension was due to an error in the report.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 8th July, 1904.

UNOPPOSED PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

PRIVATE BILLS [LORDS] (STANDING ORDERS NOT PREVIOUSLY INQUIRED INTO COMPLIED WITH).

MR. SPEAKER laid upon the Table Report from one of the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, That, in the case of the following Bill, originating in the Lords, and referred on the First Reading thereof, the Standing Orders not previously inquired into, and which are applicable thereto, have been complied with, viz.:—Ilford Urban District Council Bill [Lords].

Ordered, That the Bill be read a second time.

PRIVATE BILLS [LORDS] (NO STANDING ORDERS APPLICABLE).

Mr. SPEAKER laid upon the Table Report from one of the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, That, in the case of the following Bill, originating in the Lords, and referred on the First Reading thereof, no Standing Orders are applicable, viz.:—De Trafford Estate Bill [Lords].

Ordered, That the Bill be read a second time.

Great Central Railway Bill; London County Council (Money) Bill; Plymouth Corporation Bill; Wolverhampton Corporation Bill. Lords Amendments considered, and agreed to.

Filey Improvement Bill [Lords]; Maidenhead Bridge Bill [Lords]. Read the third time, and passed, with Amendments.

Ebbw Vale Urban District Water Bill [Lords]; Harrogate Waterworks Tramroad Bill [Lords]; Richard Jaeger's Patent Bill [Lords]. As amended, considered; to be read the third time.

Airdrie Corporation Gas Order Confirmation Bill [Lords]; Wishaw Corporation Order Confirmation Bill [Lords]. Read the third time, and passed, without Amendment.

Arbroath Corporation Water Order Confirmation Bill; Dunfermline District Water Order Confirmation Bill. Considered; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 11) Bill. As amended, considered; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

Electric Lighting Provisional Orders (No. 5) Bill [Lords]. Read a second time, and committed.

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9) Bill (by Order). As amended, considered; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

RAILWAY BILLS (GROUP No. 10).

Sir LEWIS McIVER reported from the Committee on Group No. 10 of Railway Bills; That, for the convenience of parties, they had adjourned until Tuesday next, at half-past Eleven of the clock.

Report to lie upon the Table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Soothill Nether Urban District Tramways Bill; Doncaster Corporation Bill; Skipton Water and Improvement Bill, with Amendments.

Amendments to— Minehead Urban District Council Water Bill [Lords], without Amendment.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1900." [Merchant Shipping Bill [Lords].

Also, a Bill, intituled, "An Act to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, relating to Bath Rural District, Brynmawr, Chippenham, Eastleigh and Bishopstoke, Hanwell, Southgate Urban District, Tamworth, Walton-le-Dale, Watford, and Widnes (Amendment)." [Electric Lighting Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill [Lords].

Also, a Bill, intituled, "An Act to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, relating to Ashford (Kent), Ely, Ham, Hexham, Horley, Keynsham (Somerset), Kingswood, Newton Abbot (Extension), Teignmouth (Amendment), and Walton-upon-Thames." Electric Lighting Provisional Orders (No. 4) Bill [Lords].

Also, a Bill, intituled, "An Act to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade, under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, relating to Clevedon, Portishead and Long Ashton, Crediton, Devizes, Hampton Wick and District, Houghton-le-Spring and District, the Maldens and Coombe, Northampton and District, Stroud, Nailsworth, and Dursley and Trowbridge (Urban), Bradford-on-Avon (Urban), and Bradford-on Avon (Rural)." QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a casino has been built on ground formerly part of the old English cemetery at Corfu, and whether gambling will be allowed in such casino; whether the old cemetery consisted of a piece of land 350 yards by 120 yards, and that this land has been conceded to the Greek Government in exchange for a piece of land ninety yards by sixty yards; and, if so, what were the reasons for this exchange.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) The old British cemetery is being laid out as a garden, and no casino will be built on the site. Gambling is forbidden by Greek law. The main reason for ceding the old cemetery was that it occupied a very central position, and was a serious obstacle to the extension and embellishment of the town of Corfu. The area of the old cemetery is approximately 197 by sixty-seven yards. A space of some 100 by thirteen yards has been provided in the new cemetery for the re-interment of the remains transferred from the old. A further space of about eighty-two by eighty-two yards is available for future British burials, and in addition a strip of land amounting to 750 square yards has been ceded by the municipality in case further space is required. It is estimated that the new cemetery is of sufficient extent to provide for all interments for nearly a century to come.

Position of Post Office at Kilrea, County Antrim.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast S.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the fact that the post office in Kilrea, county Antrim, is now vacant, he will consider the public convenience of placing it in a more central position than has hitherto been the case.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) In making a new appointment to the sub-post office at Kilrea, I will see that due consideration is given to the situation of the office.

Qualifications for Post Office Engineering Department.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether the recent alterations in the examinations for the position of second-class engineer were under consideration by the Department at the time the official witnesses gave evidence before the Bradford Commission; whether, in view of his declaration that telegraphists are not excluded from competition, he will state what steps the Department intend taking to give opportunities for operating telegraphists in their employ to undergo two years training in a suitable workshop attached to a college or University; and will he explain the reason for the reduction of the age limit, seeing that heretofore practical experience in the telegraph service has been considered of great advantage to the engineering department.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The scheme for throwing open to competition a certain proportion of the vacancies for second-class engineers was under consideration at the time referred to. There is nothing in the evidence given before the Wages Committee which is inconsistent with that scheme. The condition that candidates must have undergone at least two years training in a suitable workshop attached to a college or University, or under a firm of electrical or mechanical engineers, applies to candidates for those vacancies which will be filled by open competition. Officers already in the service will be eligible for promotion to the much larger number of vacancies which will be filled as before, and in this case the requirement of two years training does not apply. The limits of age, recently fixed, apply to open competition candidates only.

Volunteers in the Postal Telegraph Service—Leave to Attend Annual Inspection.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): To ask the Postmaster - General whether he will explain why the arrangements made by the authorities at the Central Telegraph Office, London, for the purpose of permitting Volunteers employed in that department to attend annual regimental inspections have been altered this year; and whether he will direct that the practice of last year shall be reverted to.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The rule is that all Volunteers on duty at the time of the inspection should be relieved and substitutes found for them by the department. No alteration has been made in the rule this year. I find, however, that some men have applied for much longer leave than is necessary to enable them to attend the inspection, and this, of course, cannot be granted.

Erection of Small Arms Factory in India.

MR. BELL (Derby): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether in view of the fact that a factory for small arms has been erected, or is in course of erection, in India, he will say how much has been expended on buildings and plant, and what further sums are to be expended on these; and can he state to what extent this factory will decrease the necessity of relying on private factories for the manufacture of small arms.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The estimated total initial expenditure on the buildings and plant is Rs. 37,50,000. The whole of this sum was included in the Estimates for the years 1902–3 and 1903–4. The actual expenditure has not yet been reported by the Government of India. The object of establishing this factory is to make India to a large extent self-supporting in the manufacture of small arms, and this must to some extent diminish the expenditure on supplies from private factories.

Pension of Mr. J. C. Neeson, Late Clerk of Belfast Union.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. J. C. Neeson, late clerk of Belfast Union, has claimed a pension on a salary of £1,764 9*s.* 10*d.*, this being the average of the past three years gross receipts as officer for clerk of the union, clerk to the No. 1 Belfast Rural Council, clerk to the Castlereagh Rural Council, compiler of the jurors' lists, compiler of the harbour lists, compensation for the loss of office in 1898 as returning officer for the board of guardians, compiler of the Belfast Parliaments lists, compiler of the Belfast municipal (women's) list, and compensation for the loss of office as compiler of income-tax lists; and, if so, will he instruct the Local Government Board to secure that the Belfast poor rate will be charged only with such sums as pension in such offices as clerk of the union and net emoluments as deputy registrar which properly belong to the Poor Rate Relief Acts.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) I replied to a Question on this matter on the 20th June.† The Local Government Board is not empowered to determine the amount of pension payable to Mr. Neeson. The guardians, I understand, have decided to take the opinion of counsel on the general question of Mr. Neeson's right to pension on the gross amount of his salary and emoluments in respect of his office as clerk of the union.

War Trophies—Alleged Refusal by London County Council.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the refusal of the London

County Council to take charge of the two guns allotted to London by the War Office, he will take steps in conjunction with the First Commissioner of Works to have them placed in some suitable public position.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) No letter has been received from the London County Council refusing the guns allotted to that body, but, should such a refusal be received, the guns would be allotted to some other town within the boundary of the Fourth Army Corps.

Epizootic Lymphangitis among Army Horses.

MR. HAYES FISHER (Fulham): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that a disease called epizootic lymphangitis has been introduced into this country from South Africa by Army horses; and that a large number of cases have occurred recently at numerous barracks; and whether, with a view of preventing its introduction into civilian stables, he will withhold the sale of cast horses until the disease has been stamped out, especially, as owing to the incubation period extending to several months, horses may be sold in an occult stage of the disease, even though veterinarily examined on the day of sale.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) It is the case that a disease called epizootic lymphangitis has appeared in this country, and it is believed that it was introduced from South Africa. 394 Army horses have been infected with this disease at various stations, of which number 254 have been destroyed, 32 have recovered, and 108 are still under treatment. Orders have been given that the sale of horses to the public from affected units will be withheld for six months from the date of the last case in that unit. I am informed that this action will effectually prevent the introduction of the disease into civilian stables.

SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if his attention has been called to a debate which took place in the Legislative Council at Pretoria last Tuesday, in which the local Colonial Secretary gave an assurance that he intended to introduce legislation restricting the trading privileges at present enjoyed by British-Indian traders in the Transvaal, when an Amendment was adopted urging the local Government to press to a conclusion the negotiations on this subject with the Imperial Government; and, if so, will he state what steps he proposes to take with reference to such intended legislation; and whether the legislation in question is directed against the subjects of the Mikado of Japan as well as against British-Indian subjects.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) I have seen the newspaper telegrams to which the hon. Member refers. I am not in a position to make any statement at present as to the legislation in question.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) BILL.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover) moved that this Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade. He said he made this proposal on behalf of the Government in order that they might have some chance of fulfilling the pledges which had been made, and on account of the congested state of business in the House. He would be out of order if he referred to the merits of the Bill, or stated what action he would be able to take in accepting this or that Amendment on it. He might remind the House that during the passing of the Land Act last year he pledged the Government to do all in their power to pass a Labourers Bill this year. That pledge was given quite indifferently to hon. Members on either side of the House. They joined in a common interest in this matter. So far, so good. But the Government now found that some hon. Members who took a great interest in the labourers held that this Bill was almost worthless. He should have to demonstrate the contrary, but it would take time and there was no time for that at this stage of the session if they tried to deal with the Bill in Committee of the Whole House. What he would suggest was that the Bill should go upstairs to the Standing Committee, that the Government should consider all the Amendments from either side of the House, and that they should there discover whether this could be made a useful measure or no. If they did not take that course they would waste some of the very short time at their disposal, and, by so doing, prejudice the chances of any other Bill to which the Government had been equally committed, or committed in even a higher degree. He moved this Motion in the interest of Members on both sides of the House, who were agreed that something ought to be done.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order [24th June] for Committee be read and discharged, and the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, etc."—(Mr. Wyndham.)

Mr. WILLIAM MOORE (Antrim, N.) said he might be permitted at the beginning to make a proposal to the Chief Secretary, whose reply might very largely alter the attitude he and his friends took up on this subject. To enter into a discussion on the merits or demerits of the Bill would, he thought, be out of order. He was about to make a proposal the acceptance of which would, he thought, facilitate the passage of the Bill, and save the time about which the Chief Secretary was so anxious. There was one section of the Bill to which they had the greatest objection. It was not necessary to the machinery of the Bill that it should remain, and it was distinct from the rest of the Bill in its effects on the part of the country he and his friends represented. Before beginning to discuss the Motion, he wished to give the Chief Secretary an opportunity of saying how far he was prepared to meet them, and to tell him that if he would omit Section 13, which would entail a loss of £10,000 to Ulster, there would be little objection from that part of the House to reasonable Amendments from the other side. He did not think this an unreasonable proposal to make, and on the manner in which the Chief Secretary dealt with it depended their attitude on the Motion. He observed no sign of assent, and having made his proposal——

Mr. WYNDHAM: I only speak with the leave of the House, but if I indicated to the hon. Member the attitude the Government is prepared to take on this Amendment, all hon. Members who have Amendments in which they take interest would be entitled to ask similar Questions. I think there is a great deal to say on the matter raised by the hon. Member and on other matters, and I assure the House I shall approach the Amendments upstairs with a desire to do what is fair to all parties interested.

Mr. WILLIAM MOORE said he quite understood the Chief Secretary's position. Still, it would have been quite possible for him to meet them on this point if he had so desired. He himself had held out the olive branch. [A Nationalist Member: The Orange branch.] It had not been accepted. He had no option, therefore, but to point out to the House the reasons—and he thought they were weighty reasons—why they should do nothing to facilitate the passage of the Bill. The Chief Secretary had given as the reason for sending the Bill to Grand Committee that its passage would be facilitated. With regard to what had been said of the Bill that was to follow, he thought every cat must hang by its own tail, and whether the next Bill was an Irish, a Scotch, or an English Bill was immaterial to the question. The Bill was supposed to be the fulfilment of pledges given not only during last session but also in the King's Speech. As far as fulfilling those pledges was concerned they had no objection to raise. The question how far part of the Bill, not in fulfilment of the pledge, was a settlement of the question was another matter.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now proceeding to discuss whether the Bill fulfils the pledges given in a previous session. That is not in order on this Motion.

Mr. WILLIAM MOORE said he bowed to the ruling, but he would point out that the Bill was proposed for the purpose of settling the claims of a very large section of the community. This he thought a matter for the House of Commons itself. He remembered when the Land Act was introduced in 1902, and a similar proposal was made that it should go to a Grand Committee, the hon. Member for Waterford, on behalf of those associated with him, indignantly rejected such a proposal, and that action was, he was bound to say, justified, because next year a better Bill was the result. He should have liked to have heard from the Chief Secretary why a Bill which proposed to solve the land question should be dealt with by the House, and a Bill which proposed to solve the labourers' question sent to Grand Committee. He supposed it could not be argued that the claims of one section were not so important as the claims of the other. Therefore, he suggested that, whatever the state of the session, the House should keep the Bill for discussion. The Chief Secretary seemed to think it would be a public calamity if the Bill did not become law that session. That calamity, however, he and his friends could bear with equanimity, as would become more and more evident to the Chief Secretary as the discussion went on, whether the Bill was retained in the House or went to Committee. What would be saved? The Bill would certainly be amended—hon. Members opposite said that, though the Bill was not a good Bill now, they hoped by Amendments they could improve it. The Chief Secretary had announced, as he did on every occasion of Irish debate, his sympathy with all Irish views and his readiness to consider such Amendments from either side as might be brought before him. They knew the right hon. Gentleman would find himself in Committee with a majority of Members opposite, for English Members would not attend a Committee on an Irish Bill, and they all knew what would be the result of the Chief Secretary's sympathies. He thought, therefore, it would be very undesirable for them, objecting as they did to the contentious parts of the Bill, to let it get into such a stage. He was rather digressing from his argument, which was that the Bill would come back amended; and that would involve a day's discussion in the House. He could assure the Chief Secretary that if ever it got through Grand Committee it would certainly occupy one day on Report.

There was no particular enthusiasm for the Bill, and why it should be forced through, for really it was forcing it through to send it to Grand Committee, he could not understand. He could not see why the ordinary principles should be departed from, and why this matter of public legislation should have more than the ordinary chance of getting through. Another reason why the Bill should not go to Committee was that it was a highly contentious Bill, containing a proposal under which a large sum of money would be transferred from one part of Ireland to another. Again and again it had been urged in the House that they should retain in their own hands measures which were highly contentious. Moreover, if the Bill should be sent to the Grand Committee, hon. Members would be entitled to debate every line, every word, every provision. What that meant they had had a forcible example in proceedings on another Bill. He only referred to that Bill as an example of a contentious Bill which the machinery of the Grand Committee failed to carry through. If this Bill would be equally contentious and equally opposed, that was an argument against sending it to a Grand Committee. It was perfectly obvious that if two or three members of the Committee opposed the Bill—and he could promise that the opposition was not limited to two or three Members—after a fortnight the Chief Secretary would have to do as a brother Minister had done in the case of the Bill he had mentioned, namely, ask the permission of the Grand Committee to withdraw it. The Bill might endure for a fortnight before the Grand Committee and then the labours of the House would be lost. He had no desire to vex or annoy the Chief Secretary, but he should like to save him from the ignominy of being compelled to ask leave of the House to drop this darling god-child. He also objected to the Bill going to this Committee because the Committee was composed of business men who were commercial princes and trade magnates, who could not be expected to possess a knowledge, indispensable in this case, of the labourers' question in Ireland. These gentlemen could not be expected to deal with the tangled skein of——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. WILLIAM MOORE said that if he was not permitted to pursue that line of argument he would ask permission to be allowed to say that this was a lawyers' Bill. He would go farther and say it was an Irish lawyers 'Bill—a Bill which could only be understood by gentlemen who had experience of the working of the Labourers Acts in Ireland. In the Grand Committee he supposed that knowledge was not over-abundant, and that fact would not help to pass the measure. It was also unfortunate that a Bill involving so much contention and special knowledge should be thrown upon the Grand Committee at this time of the session. It really meant that the labours of the Committee would be futile. It was also a long one, and already there were eleven pages of Amendments. That showed its contentious nature and also the uselessness of sending it to a Grand Committee. If it received careful attention it would occupy at least a month of Parliamentary time. The number of Amendments would swell probably still more. Sending it to a Grand Committee might be regarded as a short way of dealing with the Bill, but short cuts were not always the shortest way of getting a Bill through. There were plenty of proposals in it on which Members on both sides of the House would agree, and he would suggest that the contentious subjects should be omitted and those on which there was agreement retained. The opposition to the Bill was such that the Chief Secretary could not expect to see it back from the Committee on Report stage under three weeks. But if his suggestion were adopted the progress of the Bill would be materially hastened.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.) said that he also believed that the Bill should remain in this House on the ground that it contained contentious matter. He and his colleagues considered it to be their duty to oppose the Bill in the most strenuous way they could on account of the inclusion of Section 13, which robbed the measure of any value it might otherwise possess. But independent of that section, almost every clause contained matters of the greatest importance which should be thoroughly debated. A great reform was, for instance, proposed by transferring the powers at present exercised by the Local Government Board to the county councils. They were very inadequate and would require very drastic Amendment, and for that reason could be much better discussed in that House than in Committee. There was a very important and desirable Amendment dealing with the question of simplification of title, and which every lawyer in the House would admit required the very fullest and most careful consideration.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman cannot discuss that subject at present.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG said he only meant to discuss the contentious subjects generally. Having regard to the question of the transfer of power from the Local Government Board to the county councils, to the technicalties of the measure, and to the difficulty of dealing with the many points which were bound to arise, he maintained that that House, and not the Committee, was the proper place in which to deal with the Bill. Even though there might be a consensus of opinion among Irish Members as to the desirability of making the changes, he did hope that the Chief Secretary would reconsider his position on the matter of sending the Bill to a Grand Committee. With regard to the particular Committee to which it was to be sent, he and others objected to a Bill of this kind, which was full of legal points from beginning to end, being sent to a Committee on Trade. The scope of this Committee was supposed to be confined to questions relating to trade, manufactures, and shipping. Nobody could contend that this Bill came within that purview. He trusted the House would carefully consider the question whether they would do right to agree to the Chief Secretary's Motion. He would appeal to the Chief Secretary to meet them in the matter of Clause 13.

*MR. SPEAKER: That matter cannot be considered now.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG asked whether it would not be in order to say that the removal of a part of the Bill would take away a great deal of the objection which several hon. Members had to the measure.

The Bill was contentious and the Chief Secretary knew where the contentious matter lay. If the right hon. Gentleman would assure them that this bone of contention would be removed, there was no doubt that the feeling of opposition to the Bill amongst Ulster Members would automatically disappear. They all agreed that the Bill was useful, but he believed that labourers would not be one whit worse off if the Bill were not passed. As long as it contained the contentious matter he had referred to, the opposition to the measure in the Grand Committee would be bound to be so great that a great deal of valuable time would be lost before the Bill could possibly get through. Was the Bill worth all this ? Even with the best intentions, without erasing a great deal in the Bill, and building up a new one, they could do very little. There were some things which they would be glad and willing to see passed into law. The contentious matter, however, was so great that it was doubtful whether the Bill could ever become law. If this matter was removed, and only the innocuous and harmless matter left in, the measure might possibly do the labourers of Ireland some small good.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said he had the great and unaccustomed felicity of agreeing with his colleagues from Ulster; that was to say he agreed with them in the conclusions which they had reached, but not with their arguments. The main objection he had to the Bill was in regard to its financial provisions, and if the Bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Trade or Law, it would be perfectly impossible to introduce Amendments bearing upon the financial question because such Amendments would be wholly out of order. He was a very old Member of the Standing Committee, and he had seen that ruling given over and over again; and if any alteration was to be made in the financial clauses of the Bill, the Bill would have to be re-committed to the Committee of the Whole House. That was his serious objection to the course proposed. The hon. and learned Member for Antrim had quoted the precedent of 1902 when the Chief Secretary introduced a Bill and expressed his willingness to send that Bill to a Standing Committee at the end of the session He contended that the hon. and learned Gentleman was not entitled to cite that as a precedent for the course now proposed. He was abused and held up to opprobrium in Ulster for having objected to that course being taken on the ground that he had spoiled the settlement of the question. He did not entertain any objection to the Bill per se going to a Standing Committee. He would have been glad to see it sent to a Standing Committee of all the Irish Members, and he believed it would have been admirably dealt with by such a Committee. Some Ulster Members had objected to the Bill going upstairs because it contained one clause with which they did not agree; that was a very weak ground for objection. He did not share it and he thought the House should not be frightened by the bogey held out that the Bill would be roughly treated in the Committee. After all, they had got to the month of July. What he meant to say was that the month of July did not conduce to the intelligent discussion of Bills upstairs. They had had complete proof of that in the present week. He knew that his opinion was shared to a large extent on the other side of the House that this was an inadequate Bill. The weak point of the Bill was in the financial clause, and he did not believe it could be amended in the Committee upstairs.

MR. WYNDHAM said there was precedent for that. It could be done by Section 18 of the Act of 1883.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said that if that was the case it simplified the matter considerably. But he persisted in his view that the financial question could not be discussed by the Committee. He did not object to Clause 13, or any other clause, going to the Committee if it were possible to do in the Committee what ought to be done with regard to the matter of finance. If that could be done he would vote for its going upstairs. Manifestly this Bill should go to the Standing Committee on Law and not on Trade. If the Chief Secretary could assure him that the question of the financial portion of the Bill could be thoroughly overhauled in the Standing Committee, his difficulty would be entirely removed and he would vote for its being committed. If that could not be done—and he believed it could not—he would vote against it. Unless they could deal with the financial part of the Bill it was absolutely useless, and would mock the hopes and aspirations of the Irish nation.

IRISH LAND BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said that under ordinary circumstances he should have supposed that the right hon. Gentleman would have made this Motion in a speech to the House. He had no right to complain that the right hon. Gentleman had taken another course. The right hon. Gentleman had intimated to him a few moments ago his desire to speak at the end of the debate, and in these circumstances it devolved upon him (Mr. Redmond) to move the Motion standing in his name upon the Paper. He moved this Motion as the outcome of the decision arrived at in a national convention held in Dublin a few months ago. That convention was an assembly which might fairly be said to be representative of the national sentiment throughout the whole country. These assemblies represented not merely branches of the political organisation with which the Irish representatives on those Benches were identified, but all the elected public bodies in Ireland—county councils, district councils, and so forth, all through the country. They were representative of the clergy of all denominations, or they were open to the clergy of all denominations, and, therefore, he felt it was only fair to say that the decision unanimously come to by an assembly of that kind was a decision representing the overwhelming sentiment of the Nationalists of Ireland. He therefore moved this Resolution as the outcome of that convention and on behalf of the Irish Nationalist Party in the House of Commons.

The first thing he desired to say to the right hon. Gentleman and the House was this. This Motion was not to be taken by the right hon. Gentleman or anybody else as an expression of hostility or unfriendliness to the proper working of the Land Act of last year or as indicating any departure whatever from the attitude they adopted on the Third Reading of the Bill at the end of last year. This Motion was a protest against the action of the Government in so framing this Bill as to preclude the possibility of discussing those various defects which had come to light in the working of the former Bill, and in so framing it as to limit discussion to one particular drafting defect which affected the payment of the bonus in certain cases. Now he might say that exactly this time last year, when speaking upon the Third Reading, he used the following words which he hoped he might be forgiven for quoting to the House. He said on that occasion—

> "We cannot remain silent upon this occasion lest our critics may say that our silence was an indication of our satisfaction with the shape in which the Bill stands at this moment, and that we accept full responsibility for everything in it and for its successful working. I had better say at once this is not our Bill, it is the Bill of the Government, the responsibility for it rests not upon us but upon the Government. The Bill as it stands is marked by defects and omissions which make it necessary for us to emphasise the fact that after all the responsibility is not ours, the Bill is the Government's Bill."

He then proceeded to point out those various matters in which his friends and he considered the measure defective. He though the could truly say that upon every one of those points the working of the Act, so far as it had gone, had proved that they were right, and he moved this Motion as a protest against this manœuvre on the part of the Government whereby they were prevented from discussing on this Bill the various defects which had come to light and which urgently needed amendment.

The actual proposal in the Bill was simplicity itself; it was to rectify certain mistakes in the drafting of the measure whereby the admitted intentions of Parliament had been frustrated. One of those mistakes apparently prevented the possibility of payment of the bonus in certain cases on the sale of untenanted land, and he wished to say that nothing that they did or said upon this matter should be taken as indicating any hostility upon their part to the payment of the bonus for the sale of untenanted land. On the contrary, they all recognised that upon the rapid sale of the grass lands of Ireland, upon the rapid distribution of those lands in the enlargement of uneconomic holdings in the country, and in the provision for evicted tenants, depended absolutely the settlement of the most acute phase of the Irish land question; and if through that extraordinary blunder on the part of the Government draftsmen, and through the extraordinary oversight on the part of the Law Officers of the Crown, who had charge of the legal portion of this Bill passing through the House, a mistake had arisen in the wording of the measure which destroyed one of the chief inducements to promote the sale of the grass lands in Ireland then no one would dream of taking the responsibility of preventing the rectification of that mistake. But they believed that the sale of the untenanted grass lands of the country had not been in the main stopped by the mistake. The right hon. Gentleman on the preceding night, in the very interesting speech that he made, explained that so far as the operations of the Congested Districts Board were concerned, that mistake did not operate because he told them that he and the Board had taken the responsibility of undertaking to pay the bonus, and that the sale of land up to the present, so far as the Congested Districts Board was concerned, had proceeded as if the mistake had not taken place. And what had been the result? He had not the exact figures, but in the nine months working of the Bill the amount of untenanted land purchased by the Congested Districts Board had been lamentably small, and the reason why it had been so very small must be looked for quite apart altogether from the mistake in the wording. That was exactly what they predicted during the Committee stage last year, and on the Third Reading also they said that quite apart from the question of the bonus, the measure as it stood would not lead to the sale of the grass lands of Connaught and the West of Ireland as rapidly as was necessary. He said at that time—

> "We do not believe the Bill as it stands will be able to grapple successfully with the congested districts question. The constitution of the Board is such that we do not believe that it has any serious chance of being able to settle this question, and I am convinced that in a comparatively short space of time the Government will find that the advice which we gave them as the result of our experience, and which they have rejected, must be accepted if this question is to be settled."

And he said now that the failure of the Act to break up the grass lands of Connaught was due not to the defect with reference to the bonus, but to an entirely different cause. First of all he believed it was due to some extent, perhaps to a large extent, to the present constitution and policy of the Congested Districts Board. Last year they pressed strongly upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of amending the constitution of that Board. But he neglected their advice, and he believed himself that, until some radical amendment was made, its work would not be carried out with that vigour which was essential if this question was to be settled in a short space of time. But a great deal more important was the absence of all compulsory powers in the hands of the Board to acquire these grass lands. This was not a question of general compulsory purchase in Ireland. It was a limited question which came up for discussion in the land conference which initiated the Land Bill of last year, and there was no difference of opinion at that land conference between the representatives of landlords and tenants that, so far as Connaught or the grass lands in the West and Congested Districts of Ireland were concerned, compulsory powers were desirable and would be necessary, and a paragraph was put in the report which plainly indicated that that was the unanimous opinion. The opinion had been almost unanimous everywhere upon the subject. The Board itself, as the right hon. Gentleman remembered, in 1895 passed a unanimous resolution declaring that they could not satisfactorily carry on their work unless they had compulsory powers, and he could appeal to him himself, because last year in speaking of this question he declined to put compulsory powers into his Bill. What was the reason he gave? Not that he thought compulsory powers were wrong, but because he thought they were unnecessary. He said the inducements to sell under the Bill were so great that there would be no difficulty in acquiring the grass lands of the West. He clearly indicated the view that if his anticipation proved to be false and the inducements to sell were not sufficient, he himself would have no objection to the principle of compulsion as applied to this particular case. He (Mr. Redmond) and his colleagues protested against the form in which the Bill was drawn, because it prevented any possibility of raising the question of compulsory powers for the Congested Districts Board, and hindered the discussion of questions which were operating to prevent the successful working of the Act in the West of Ireland.

There were certain features in the working of the Land Act, so far as it had gone, which undoubtedly were causing the gravest possible anxiety, and which, in the highest interests of the country, ought to be immediately the subject of careful consideration and amendment of the law. The first—he put it first because he believed it was most urgent—was the question of the untenanted lands and of the enlargement of uneconomic holdings. If everything else in the Act were perfect, if it worked all over the country successfully and satisfactorily, and if this question of the breaking up of the grass lands were left out, the land question in Ireland would not be near a settlement. It was from the question of the uneconomic holdings that all the trouble, all the misery, all the crime, and all the emigration which had been caused by the land question had sprung, and it was futile to think that any measure—even although it worked satisfactorily elsewhere — would settle the Irish land war if that portion which related to the West of Ireland was unsatisfactory, and yet the Government had jockeyed them out of the possibility of effectively discussing this question, and of proposing any amendments in the law which in nine months working had been proved to be defective.

The second question which was exercising the public mind in Ireland and was causing the gravest anxiety, was the question of the evicted tenants. Again, he said with reference to the evicted tenants' question what he had said with reference to Connaught—there could be no settlement of the Irish land question which did not include a settlement of the evicted tenants question, and he was afraid the Estates Commissioners did not seem to realise how much of the success of the measure throughout Ireland depended upon their attitude with regard to the evicted tenants. He wished hon. Gentlemen to realise that there could be no peace, no settlement, and no end of the land war until these men were restored to their homes or were given farms elsewhere. Again, they were absolutely precluded from raising any question in Committee or any Amendment. But perhaps the most widely serious aspect of all was the action which had been taken by a large section of the Irish landlords themselves. He knew that the Bill of last year gave full power to the Land Commissioners to say what was an estate and what was not, and they had full power to say to the landlord, "We will not hold this to be an estate and will not allow the sale to go through unless you put in along with the tenanted land the grass lands which you have." He knew that they had that power; but he knew nothing of the exercise of that power by them. It would be satisfactory to the whole country if the right hon. Gentleman would give them an assurance that in cases of that kind the Estates Commissioners would decline to define as an estate any portion of tenanted land brought in where the landlord refused to sell the grass lands in his possession. They had knowledge of cases in which there had been a refusal to restore evicted tenants to their holdings, and they had particularly a case in which Lord Lansdowne had absolutely refused to consider the question of the restoration of an evicted tenant. His was not the case of an ordinary landlord. He was a member of the Government, the Leader of the House of Lords, and a member of the Government also that promoted the Land Act, and one of the landlords who approved of the land conference. Last year an Amendment was moved in the House of Lords by the Earl of Westmeath, the object of which was practically to destroy the evicted tenants' clause in the Bill. That was resisted by the Government, and Lord Lansdowne said—

> "If this Bill had in his eyes one recommendation more than another it was that they saw in it the possibility of the restoration of peace and goodwlll between landlords and tenants in Ireland. Surely, added Lord Lansdowne,

> the Earl of Westmeath and Lord Barrymore must know that this provision for the restoration of the evicted tenants, or their representatives in suitable cases, to the holdings which they once occupied was an essential element in the compromise; and that if that element had been excluded the Bill might not at that moment be on the Table of the House at all."

That statement was quite inconsistent with the action which had been, as far as he knew, rightly attributed to Lord Lansdowne, and it was rather a serious matter when an example of that kind was set by a person representing the Government, and who himself was one of the authors of the Bill. Further than that, there unquestionably was on foot in many parts of Ireland an attempt by certain landlords to force their tenants to buy on terms fixed by the landlords themselves, by calling up the hanging gale, and by proceeding for old arrears. That was a most deplorable thing if it were true. He took his information not only from the Press, but from his colleagues, who came there and spoke of what they knew in their own districts. Their statement was that hanging gales, some of which had been in existence since the famine, had been suddenly called up—in many cases simply to bring pressure to bear on the tenants to agree to any terms the landlord might propose. The result was that over a large portion of Ireland there was friction, and he was afraid there was trouble brewing; and just as the hopes and anticipations aroused by the Act of last year were great so would the trouble be serious and deep if those hopes were disappointed. Yet the Government, in face of that state of things, refused the Irish Members an opportunity on this Bill of discussing Amendments to the Act which had been shown to be necessary by the working of the last nine months. In taking that course, in his judgment, the Government was acting with unheard-of folly. The Irish Party's attitude towards the measure had not changed. The hon. Member for East Mayo said last year—

> "This Bill leaves the House with the goodwill of the Irish Party, and with a pledge from us that we will give it fair play, with an honest desire, according to our lights, to make it work."

That was their attitude then; it had been their attitude since; it was their attitude now. But they felt bound to protest against being deprived of the opportunity of a full and free discussion of those defects which experience had shown was marring the working of the Act, and of proposing Amendments which experience had proved to be necessary if the measure was really to secure the beneficent results to which they all looked forward last year. For these reasons he moved the Motion standing in his name.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork County, E.) in seconding the Amendment, said it embodied the conclusion unanimously adopted at the recent National Convention, and might therefore be regarded as practically the mandate of the Irish people. The object of the Government Bill was merely to remedy certain defects in the drafting of the Land Act of last year, and, therefore, it was, of course, a matter of far more concern to the landlords than to the tenants. At the same time this Bill, under ordinary circumstances, would be useful and would have the support of Irish Members, because it would be very desirable to facilitate the working of the Land Act if only for the sake of the restoration of evicted tenants to their homes. But, under existing conditions and in view of the exorbitant prices demanded by Irish landlords, he thought it extremely doubtful whether it was desirable to accelerate the present pace. It was intended that the tenants should gain at least some advantage from the bonus; but experience showed that the bonus had only served to increase the price of land. It seemed to have whetted the appetites of the Irish landlords. The Chief Secretary seemed to measure the success of the Act by the number of sales that had been effected. He ventured, however, to think that the real point was whether the tenants were getting value for their money. If the terms on which the sale of land was taking place were equitable and just, the more speedily the land was transferred from the landlords to the tenants the better; but, on the other hand, if the tenants were paying more than the market value of the land, each transaction increased the risk of the Irish ratepayers, because undoubtedly it must place an undue burden upon the purchaser. The whole question turned upon the point whether the terms were fair or unfair, safe or unsafe.

What had happened during the past twelve months to boom the price of land in Ireland? While prices had gone up the value of Irish land had steadily gone down. That appeared to be a very unnatural situation. He was able to speak from personal experience and knowledge of the subject, because he was a practical Irish farmer, and although most of the land which he farmed was his own property, and no land in Ireland was farmed better, he found it more difficult each year to make any profit whatever. This was owing undoubtedly to increasing foreign competition and to the increasing cost of production. What, then must be the condition of farmers who were struggling to pay heavy annual instalments? He considered their situation most serious, and that fact ought to be recognised by the Chief Secretary. The terms would be too high even if the rents were fair rents; but how could judicial rents be fair when they were all fixed by landlords and not by tenants? The Attorney-General for Ireland had never packed an Irish jury as the present Government and the landlords between them had packed the Irish Land Commission. The question might be asked, why did the tenants agree to pay preposterous prices? He thought the chief reason was, as his hon. and learned friend had pointed out, that the last disastrous year left them at the mercy of the landlords' combination because, although there were exceptions, the vast majority of the landlords in Ireland refused to recognise the disastrous losses their tenants suffered last year and pressed for the last penny of rent. Consequently the tenants very naturally took refuge in purchase at almost any price. The tenants were tempted to do this because under the Land Act of last year they were able to add the current year's rent to the purchase money and that no doubt gave them some temporary relief. He was afraid that in many cases the Irish tenants had clutched at this privilege as a drowning man clutched at a straw. The object of the landlords' combination had been to force up the price of Irish land to a fictitious value, and unfortunately that object had been attained. As the Chief Secretary knew very well, the current prices were far in excess of the prices paid under previous Acts, and in many cases they were far in excess of the prices of farms recently sold by the official inspectors and even by the landlords themselves. Therefore he thought it was absolutely essential to revert to the old system of inspection in order to safeguard the interests of the tenants.

As an illustration of how the present system was working in Ireland perhaps he might be allowed to mention as a case in point the instance of the Edlin tenants in his own constituency. Last winter he offered the landlord on behalf of these tenants twenty-two years purchase of second-term rents but that offer was curtly refused and under threats of pains and penalties the landlord demanded an impossible price and the immediate payment of all rent due. The tenants having offered the utmost farthing they could afford to pay very properly stood firmly to their offer, and what the result. On Saturday last, just as these farms were being put up for sale by the sheriff of the Court, the landlord yielded to firmness what he had denied to justice and fair play and accepted the terms which he (the hon. Member) had offered six months ago. In this instance, all had gone well, and "all's well that ends well." For this, however, the tenants had only to thank themselves. He thought the Irish tenant should be able to obtain justice without having to fight for it. For himself he had always been in favour of the Land Conference policy. He had invariably found tenants not only willing but anxious to meet their landlords in a liberal and generous spirit, but he regretted to say that he had very seldom found that spirit reciprocated by the landlords. He thought the time had come when this question should be looked in the face and if some change was not made, and very soon made, in the direction indicated in this Amendment it was very doubtful whether the Act of last year might not result in disaster instead of proving a blessing to the country. Compulsion was the only remedy and it had been recognised as the only real solution of the question. He begged to second the Motion.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out from the word, 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, 'no measure dealing with the Amendment of the Irish Land Act of 1903 can be accepted as satisfactory which deals only with facilitating Irish landlords in obtaining the bonus, and which provides no remedy for the grave defects of that Act affecting Irish tenants, particularly the creation of a system of zones leading to the unjust inflation of prices, and the absence of provisions for the compulsory acquisition of untenanted land essential for the enlargement of holdings, the restoration of evicted tenants, and the final settlement of the Irish land question' instead thereof." — (Mr. John Redmond.)

Mr. FLYNN (Cork County, N.) said that all along the tenants had been most anxious that the Land Act should work smoothly and rapidly and they had been most anxious to meet the landlords fairly. Speaking as one who had had a good deal of experience in one part of Ireland during the past nine months upon this question he had no hesitation in saying that that feeling had not been reciprocated by the landlords as a rule. He thought the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken might have emphasised his argument in regard to the case he had alluded to by stating that that very property was actually offered at a lower price to the tenants—at a lower number of years purchase—before there was any talk of purchase. The unfortunate thing in regard to this bonus which was based upon the security of Irish funds and Irish rates was that instead of assisting the tenants it had been diverted to stimulate and raise the price to be paid for the land by the tenants. Nobody who had watched the course of events since November last could deny that the Amendment and the arguments used by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford were the very quintessence of moderation. The tenants naturally expected some share of this bonus and had thought that it would make their terms of purchase easier, but they were mistaken. He challenged any representative of the landlords, or any landlord, to give one single case in which a tenant had asked for a penny or a single farthing of the bonus. There was property in his constituency which was valued at nineteen years purchase under the Ashbourne Acts for which the landlords were now asking twenty-two and twenty-three years purchase together with the bonus. That was a most unlooked for state of things. In this case appetite grew by what it fed on. The landlords' appetite had been spoken of as having been whetted, but in his opinion it had now become voracious. In the case he had mentioned the landlord was looked upon as one of the most generous landlords, but under the stimulus of this bonus his property had gone up to the most preposterous prices and what was intended as a blessing to the tenants had turned out to be a curse. Unless the reforms suggested in the Amendment were carried out a settlement of the land question was impossible.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.) said that the introduction of the Land Bill last year led them to hope that a final and satisfactory settlement of the Irish land problem would have been arrived at. During the past century that question had prevented proper attention being given to other great questions, such as education, industrial improvement, and the housing of the working classes, which had been awaiting settlement, and naturally they were delighted at the prospect opened up. He recognised that the Chief Secretary had done everything in his power, with the forces behind him, to settle the whole of this difficult question. But having watched the administration of the Land Act during the past nine or ten months, he was bound to say that the hopes then formed were far from being realised. The blame did not rest with the Irish farmer, who was anxious to do everything in his power to become the owner of his land. But in Ireland land was not fetching its market value but a monopoly value, and even greater than a monopoly value. During the last eighteen years in which the Irish Land Acts had been in operation £22,000,000 worth of land had been transferred from landlords to tenants, and the average price had been not more than seventeen years purchase of the rental—the highest price not being more than twenty-one years purchase. It might be said that the system of agrarian agitation pursued by the Irish people was the cause of the landlords selling at so low a price, and that the Irish people had no regard to the rights of property. He denied that. Sir Alfred Milner, giving evidence before the Commission on the Depreciation of Land Values in 1897, said that the value of Irish land had enormously decreased, and that the value of English land had in the same period decreased from thirty years to eighteen years purchase in Schedule A of the income-tax returns. Sir Robert Giffen, and every other witness before the Commission said the same thing.

On the passing of the Land Act, the tenants of the estates in his own constituency formed a committee of advice and showed that they were only too anxious to do everything in their power, consistently with their own safety, to meet the landlords fairly and reasonably, and had shown their willingness, not only to give the market value, viz., seventeen years purchase, but to give two years purchase more than neighbouring landlords had received under the former land purchase Acts—in addition to which the landlords would have got three years purchase by way of bonus. The Irish tenants had gone further than their own safety entitled them to go in endeavouring to meet the landlords. The landlords, had, however, disappointed the hopes of men who thought they would do something for the country they had robbed for centuries. They had shown themselves hopelessly incompetent to meet the overtures made to them by the Irish tenants. If the landlords' demands were to be accepted, the children and the grandchildren of the Irish tenants would be ruined, and Ireland would be in a condition of national bankruptcy. It was true that the tenants could not compel the landlords to sell; but it was not true that the landlords could not compel the tenants to buy. He had received a letter signed by ten of his constituents stating that between March, 1903, and January, 1904, they had paid three gales of rent, and that they had been asked in the first week of April for a fourth gale. That fourth gale was the hanging gale which had never been previously demanded. Those unfortunate tenants were being persecuted in this manner notwithstanding the scarcity of food and fuel, and after a bad harvest, in order to drive them to purchase.

The landlords contended that they ought to receive an amount which, if invested in trust funds, would produce their present net income. They were, however, pushing their demands a little too far. He challenged any landlord in Ireland to produce books which would show that his net income was 90 per cent., or even 70 per cent. of his gross income. If the landlords were prepared to sell at a price which would produce their genuine net income he would not object; but why should they, of all landlords in the world, demand 90 per cent. of their gross income. According to the Agricultural Depression Commission of 1897, the net income of the landlords in this country was only 51 per cent. of their gross income. The English landlord had markets at his door; and yet his net income was only 51 per cent. of his gross income. The landlords on the western coast of Ireland, however, demanded 90 per cent. of their gross income. That was perfectly monstrous and absurd. The Irish tenant had shown his desire to facilitate the transfer of the land. The Irish landlords had, however, been true to their history; and would not be satisfied with what their colleagues in this country would accept. It had been said that the landlords were ready to help in a settlement; but he would ask how many evicted tenants, who had been living in squalor and misery, had been reinstated? There were over 400 evicted tenants in Kerry; and during the nine months the Act had been in operation not one of them had been reinstated. Neither had the Estates Commissioners taken any step in that direction. It was the duty of the Irish Members to secure justice for these men. One landlord in his constituency, Lord Ventry, had refused to sell at any price. 50 per cent. of his tenants were future tenants; and they had to continue to pay the old rack rents. They could not even have fair rents fixed. Having regard to all these conditions, it was time that the House took action in the interests of future tenants. He sincerely hoped—though he supposed the hope was vain—that the Irish landlords would at last consider the interests of their country, having regard to the advantages which the Act conferred on them and enable the Irish tenants to purchase their holdings at fair prices.

*Mr. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid) did not suppose that any Irish Member—Unionist or Nationalist—was entirely satisfied with the Land Bill which had been brought in by his right hon. friend the Chief Secretary. They all thought that it was too small, and that many points which might usefully have been dealt with, had been omitted from it. He believed, for example, that besides dealing with the bonus, the Chief Secretary would have done well to make an effort to remove another obstacle to land purchase. He referred to the cost of proving title of superior interests, which were now thrown upon the selling landlord. These superior interests were much thicker than was generally supposed. Where they existed it was seldom that a landlord who was willing to sell could make any calculation as to what he might get in the end; because he could form no idea as to the cost of proving the titles of perhaps two or three superior interests of which he might have had no previous knowledge whatever. This uncertainty was deterring many landlords from selling their estates, and he could not help thinking that there was no greater hardship in compelling the owners of superior interests to bear the cost of proving their own titles than there was in making the selling landlord prove his title at his own expense. That was but one of many minor difficulties which would have to be dealt with in another amending Bill if the Land Act of last year was to be completely successful. He did not think that the limited character of the Bill before them was a sufficient reason for its rejection. It would serve a useful purpose by facilitating sales, and therefore he would give it his support. He did not agree with the suggestion which was contained in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford that it was merely a landlords' Bill. The purpose of the measure was to expedite sales under last year's Act, by making clear what was the evident intention of Parliament in regard to the distribution of the bonus. Therefore, it was designed as much in the interests of the tenant farmers as of the landlords; and it was for that reason he should vote for the Second Reading.

The hon. Member for Waterford appeared to desire to upset the entire scheme of last year's Act and throw the whole question of land purchase once more into the melting pot. He could not think that such a course would be in the interests of the tenant farmers of Ireland; and he regretted that the hon. and learned Member had proposed an Amendment which could not fail to encourage agitation and discourage those friendly negotiations upon which the success of any scheme of voluntary land purchase must depend. No one regretted more than he did the attitude which had been adopted by some of the landlords in Ulster. He noticed that at a recent meeting of the Landlords' Convention it was argued that Ulster landlords should get a better price for their land because the security was better. But the landlords did not create the security. The security was good because the people were frugal, industrious, law-abiding and honourably mindful of their just obligations. To contend that because tenant farmers had paid rent regularly and without giving trouble they should now be expected to give a higher price for their land was—he ventured to say — altogether unreasonable. The attempt of some landlords to put a money value upon the sentiment of ownership—which they were called upon to relinquish under the Act—could not be justified; these were simply passing phases of a great movement of reform. He, for one, did not take a gloomy view of the future of the Land Act. On the contrary, considering the short time it had been in operation, he thought the results were very encouraging. He admitted there was a danger of the extremists on both sides bringing about a state of deadlock. He felt confident, however, that the good sense of the tenant farmers would prevail on the one hand to bring about the maintenance of a reasonable spirit; while on the other hand he had no doubt that Parliament would, if necessary, grant compulsory powers of purchase—to be applied in the case of landlords who, in spite of every inducement, refused to sell their estates. As the House knew, he was an advocate of compulsory purchase—as a last resource. He had voted for compulsion in the House, and he should be prepared to do so again should it be found necessary to introduce such a measure to complete land purchase. He believed, however, that a premature agitation for compulsion would simply delay the establishment of the system of occupying ownership of agricultural land in Ireland. The Land Act of last year must have a fair chance. Parliament could assist its operation by removing obstacles to negotiation where they were shown to exist. It would—in his opinion—be a great mistake to make any violent change, at this stage, in the principles or the methods of last year's Act; and, therefore, he trusted the House would reject the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford and agree to the Second Reading of the Bill.

*MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.) said he rose with considerable hesitation and a full sense of his responsibility as a Member of that House, and as the representative of South Kildare, not only to support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford but also to oppose the Bill of the Chief Secretary. Those who had been present at the land debates in that House in the previous year must have been impressed by the fact that the chief case the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary made out for the necessity of the Land Act was the state of the congested districts in Connaught. Let hon. Members refer to what had been done in the way of removing the congestion and restoring evicted tenants in Connaught. He defied anyone to say that the Act had been anything but an abject failure. It had neither relieved congestion nor restored evicted tenants. A good deal of criticism had been passed upon the Congested Districts Board because they had not bought up untenanted lands in Connaught and distributed them among the people, but it was neither fair nor honest to put the whole blame upon them, because they had been unable to purchase untenanted land. The moment the Land Act became law the landlords demanded of Mr. Doran, the representative of the Congested Districts Board in these matters, the unreasonable price of thirty or forty years purchase and the Congested Districts Board should not be blamed because they refused to pay this exorbitant price for land which, before the passing of the Land Act, the landlords would have been glad to sell at sixteen or eighteen years purchase.

The land in Connaught rose and fell in value in sympathy with the price of land in Kildare, Meath, Dublin, and the best parts of Ireland. He frankly admitted he did everything he could to prevent his own constituents from giving twenty-five years purchase on second-term rents, because he believed that twenty-five years purchase on second-term rents reduced twelve and a half per cent. on first-term rents was not a sound bargain. Conditions were too onerous to enable the tenants to pay that price for sixty-eight-and-a-half years and to pay their instalments punctually and with regularity. In 1888, when agricultural produce was worth much more than it was at the present time and when the financial position of the tenant farmer was much better and stronger than it was to-day, the best land was sold for eighteen years purchase; now, with the existing state of affairs in Ireland and in view of the agricultural prices which existed, who could say that twenty-five years purchase on second-term rents was a sound investment? If twenty-five years purchase on second term rents was the fair price to pay now, surely those men who in 1888 purchased land at eighteen years purchase under former Acts, and who had received one decadal reduction in their rents, were going to receive another, and would very soon have a third—surely those people ought to be rich. If, however, hon. Members went among those who purchased in 1888 in Kildare on a portion of the Leinster property, or if they went to the banks to see if their bank balances had increased since 1888, they would find that not only had their bank balances not increased but those who were able to do so were only too glad to show the same balance in 1904 as they were in 1888.

This was a matter that affected England as much as Ireland. He never entered into the Irish land agitation for the simple purpose of improving the Irish tenant's position, but because he thought it was a step towards Home Rule; he believed that once the Irish tenant farmer became a free man he would be a far stronger Home Ruler than ever he had been before. The bargains that had been arrived at in Kildare, where they had twenty-six years purchase without the bonus and nearly twenty-nine with the bonus, had been brought about in this way. The inducement in every case was the fact that one year's rent was forgiven and in some cases an extra half year's rent would be taken off the arrears and added to the purchase money. The mere fact that they were in arrear with their rent, although they had second-terms rents, was proof positive that farming was anything but a paying business in Kildare, and they required large reductions in rent if they were to meet their engagements. The right hon. Gentleman had said that fifty evicted tenants had been reinstated by individual landlords and twenty-three by the Estates Commissioners, that large amounts had been given in grants, and other moneys had been advanced by way of loan, but the question he desired to ask was, had the Estates Commissioners no power to approach a grabber who was in possession of an evicted tenant's holding, who was willing to give up the holding if he was given compensation, and allow the evicted tenant to negotiate with his former landlord? Those were two important points which he should like to have cleared up. Ireland was anxious to know, and he hoped it would know from an authoritative source like the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, what the exact powers of the Estates Commissioners were. Had they any powers at all, except to advance money, as they had done in the case of the Coolgreaney estate? Was that the full extent of their powers? Because, if so, this Bill would not settle the evicted tenants' questions. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the evicted tenants had no wish to be transplanted; they wanted no other land than that farm from which they had been evicted. All that every evicted tenant wanted was to be restored to the holding upon which he had been born and brought up, and where his forefathers had lived before him. It was the old associations which the evicted tenants wanted restored more than anything else, and when the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh got up and spoke of the heart-strings of the Irish landlords being broken by having to part with their beloved tenants, whom for years they had denounced as rogues and vagabonds, he would ask those hon. Gentlemen to consider the broken-hearted condition of the evicted tenants. The evicted tenants did not want this land question to remain for ever open, and in order that a settlement might be arrived at, where they could not be reinstalled, they were willing to go on to other farms of approximately the same size as those from which they had been evicted, but, as he had said, their hearts' desire was to be restored to their old holdings. Their silence on the last Land Bill had not been properly considered in this light. It had been regarded as cowardice; but there was a limit to human endurance, and, if the right hon. Gentleman continued to deal with this matter in the dilettante fashion in which he had been dealing with it, before he left the Irish Office his eyes and ears would be opened on the general question of land purchase.

The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the real security for the financial success of these transactions of land purchase was the difference of 20 per cent. between the future annuity and the second-term rent. He believed that was too slender a margin on which to build up the prosperity of Ireland for the next sixty-eight-and-a-half years. He wanted to see the Irish race raised out of the slough of despond in which they had been for so many years, and he thought that in all likelihood that this 20 per cent., especially on the large tillage farms of Ireland, would be eaten up by the increased price of labour. He believed that the Irish agricultural labourer in almost every instance in the past had not had sufficient remuneration for his labour, and it was because of that fact that they had left the country in such large numbers. They would never, in his opinion, succeed in keeping ambitious or intelligent labourers in Ireland unless the wages approximated somewhat to the wages earned in other countries. The average price paid for Irish land since the passing of the Land Act was twenty-one years purchase of first - term rents and twenty-three years purchase of second-term rents. The price had gone up in practically the same ratio as the price of agricultural produce had gone down. Irish land was one of the worst securities in the world. Yet it was bringing a much higher price than ground-rents in the best part of Dublin. That was a most anomalous state of affairs. It was a thing beyond his comprehension that the landlord should get more because the farmer earned less. He was told that the rate of interest on the annuity being 3¼ per cent., instead of 4 per cent., as under the Ashbourne Acts, would enable the tenant farmer to give a greater number of years purchase, but the decadal reductions under the former system were worth 20 per cent. Under this Bill there was no provision for decadal reductions. He submitted that the purchasers under this Act should be in the same position as the men who purchased under the Ashbourne Acts. It was because the acceptance of these terms gave him some temporary relief, because it put off the evil day for another year or two, that the tenant agreed to them. He would like to know of an English landlord who got twenty-six years purchase for agricultural land. There would be a great many English landlords who would be only too glad to get it.

It was because he was convinced that the transactions that had taken place under the Land Act were unsound financially that he should vote against this Bill. He could well remember that in his younger days he was fond of buying penny books which graphically described the exploits of such men as Grant and Frieney, two well-known highwaymen, who robbed the people of the country to their hearts' content, until friendly police appeared on the scene and drove them off. Well, he ventured to think that these men were not much worse than some of the Irish landlords to-day. He was justified in saying that, because under the Land Act, by the system of zones which took away the safeguard of inspection, they had got rid of the friendly policemen whose duty it was to beat off the hereditary plunderer. The Irish Members now asked that the system of inspection should be restored. Who were the inspectors appointed under previous Purchase Acts? They had been entirely taken from the landlord classes; they were landlords' sons, sons of landlords and land agents, and they over and over again reported that the prices agreed on were too high and did not give sufficient security to the Treasury. It was because he honestly believed these things that he would, with his whole heart, vote against the Bill.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said he had listened with great satisfaction to the moderate speech of the Leader of the Nationalist Party. Personally he looked upon the breakdown of the Act as a temporary phase, and he agreed that in dealing with any measure of the magnitude of the Land Act time and fair play must be given before judging the results; He for one had never expected complete and immediate results from a Land Purchase Act which necessarily contained many ramifications and was intended to apply to all time. He entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Waterford also, that so far as the question of the untenanted land was concerned, so far as the evicted tenants were concerned, and so far as the question of the enlargement of the holdings was concerned—and these were very large items indeed—there had been a temporary breakdown, giving room for the gravest disappointment and for resolute action on the part of the Government, and of that House, if necessary. The breakdown, as regarded all three points, was largely owing to the decision of Mr. Justice Ross on the question of the bonus; that in his opinion was a most unfortunate decision. Of course, the Estates Commissioners now could not buy untenanted land without being ready to pay the bonus and Mr. Justice Ross had the satisfaction of having practically arrested one of the most philanthropic and beneficent parts of the whole Act. It was because he saw in the Bill a peremptory method of reversing that decision and allowing the Act to have free course that he welcomed a debate on the whole question. Those of them who had been in the House ever since the first Land Purchase Act came into operation and could look back, for instance, to the Act of 1885, were aware that during nineteen years, as the result of the Acts, £22,000,000 had been spent on land purchase in Ireland. The present Land Act had been in operation for eight months, and they heard from the Chief Secretary that applications to the extent of £8,000,000 had already been before the Estates Commissioners. It was perfectly impossible for land reformers in Ireland or out of it to ignore that fact, and in his opinion it gave promise of a great future for this question. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: What about the prices?] He did not think this was a debate on which Members ought to speak without forethought, and hopes should not be raised or dashed by their discussion. The issues were much too serious for that. They had not only had the facts he had mentioned from the Chief Secretary but they had had the other fact that negotiations were going on all over the country, and estates coming in to the Commissioners every day in large numbers, which also gave them a ground for hope.

Now he came to the question of the prices, and he was exceedingly glad to see the hon. Member for North Antrim in his place, for he had something to say in regard to that Gentleman's negotiations with his tenants. So far as second-term rents were concerned the average price paid under what was known as Wyndham's Act was twenty-three-and-a-half years purchase. That was the average price as shown by the returns which had come in, and he was prepared to tell any one to close with 20 per cent. reduction in addition to the reduction of 38 per cent. already effected, for he had consistently told his constituents in Ulster that such terms could not be deemed to be a bad bargain. The real difficulty was not here, but with respect to first-term rents and non-judicial tenancies. Landlords had made hay of the Act so far as those tenancies were concerned. The Land Conference had been assailed, but he believed no body of men ever did a better day's work for Ireland. The Conference proposed a certain reduction on second-term rents, with a fair equivalent for first-term rents and non-judicial tenancies. Instead of giving that, the landlords were doing nothing of the kind, first-term rents bringing much too high a price when compared with second-term rents, and as to non-judicial tenancies the terms were simply enormous. He was going to give an illustration of this from a letter written by the hon. and learned Member for North Antrim.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE said that was a private letter to a friend and not to a tenant. Although he could not prevent his friend reading it in the House, if he thought that was fair and honourable, if the hon. Member did so he must take the consequences in his own constituency.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said he would take any consequences in his own constituency or anywhere else. He would not read the hon. and learned Member's letter, however, but he would read the tenant's letter to the hon. and learned Member, which was not private and which the tenant had forwarded to him.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE: The letter I got from this gentleman was marked "private" and the answer also was private. It should be treated as confidential, and there was no right to show it to any one. If the letter was read he would ask leave to make a personal explanation.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL then read the letter, dated 1st December, 1903, in which the writer said, having seen a letter of the hon. Member for North Antrim in which it was stated that he considered twenty years purchase fair, "I cannot understand on what grounds you have increased your estimate so much as to ask almost twenty-eight years, exclusive of the bonus." The hon. and learned Gentleman was typical of landlords all over the country. That they should have been willing to accept twenty years purchase before the Act was passed and now asked twenty-eight years exclusive of the bonus, was a gross abuse of the Parliamentary grant. This was a matter which English Members would do well to consider. After all it was their money which was being dealt with in this way. Yet this was what was going on all over the country, and it was this that he strongly objected to. The landlords under the circumstances had no right to exact such terms.

There was another point. The hon. and learned Member for Waterford had indicated that before much time had elapsed the principle of compulsion must be brought into play and that, so far as certain districts were concerned, it would be impossible to get the untenanted lands into the operation of the Act without compulsory powers. With that he agreed and, indeed, he held that compulsory powers should have been introduced into the Bill itself. What was going on, especially in the province of Ulster? A considerable number of sales were at present going forward, and he was much more hopeful than before because he was happy to think that the tenants were not being led to give too high prices. Those on the largest estate in South Tyrone had absolutely refused to give the landlord what they thought to be an unfair price. There were in Ulster, for instance, a very considerable number of landlords who would not sell at any price. It might be asked why they should be compelled to do so. Because it was the evident intention of the Government in passing last year's Act to make it a measure of national appeasement based upon broad grounds of national policy and upon the assumption that it was desirable for the land of Ireland to pass from owner to occupier. This was a landlords' Bill in the sense that it would secure to the landlord what the Land Act of 1903 attempted to secure for him, but it was more than a landlords' Bill, because if it were not passed it would be impossible to sell the land, and he, therefore, hoped it would be passed. He still believed that if the Irish land question were settled the principal difficulty would be removed from the path of Irish progress. He did not doubt that in many cases too much would be paid for the land and tenants would be taken in by wily and crafty agents, but he looked upon the Land Act of last year as an instrument of a great appeasement of the Irish difficulty. It was not a question with him as to the actual market value of the land, but a question of getting a great settlement of this question and clearing the way for other things almost as important.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE said he desired to make a personal explanation. He had only just heard in the lobby that the hon. Member for South Tyrone was going to raise a personal matter concerning himself. Had he known earlier he would have provided himself with the correspondence. The letter which the hon. Member had referred to was not addressed to a tenant of his (Mr. Moore) though it was true that the gentleman addressed was the minister of one tenant. It was a private letter. It contained an offer, which was never accepted, good or bad. He heard a year afterwards that the letter had been shown and he wrote protesting. He considered the whole transaction closed and had forgotten the letter was written, while the tenant had attended a meeting at which an offer was made of twenty-two years purchase. He had seen a letter from the minister since, and he then recognised an attempt by this gentleman to force him into giving him better terms than his neighbours. Nine-tenths of his tenants had accepted his terms as fair. He was determined, whatever it cost him, not to be driven. This gentleman would get the same terms as the others and no better.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover) said he was responsible for the introduction of the Bill, which only purported to give effect to the intentions of the Legislature last year. It was true that if the Bill were not passed the Land Purchase Act would be hung up and blame would be placed upon the House of Commons. He believed the Act was working well, but he was perfectly certain it could not continue to act unless this Bill were passed. The Act of last year did not embody all the resolutions of the Land Conference, but the interests of the two parties interested had been fairly well preserved. Both were shorn of some of their advantages, but the arrangements under the Act were in the main those arrived at by the Land Conference. The hon. and learned Member for Waterford had protested against the form of the Bill because, in his opinion, it precluded him at later stages from raising the question of compulsory purchase. If the Bill had been drafted in any other form, looking at the state of Parliamentary business, it would not be possible to pass it this session. The hon. and learned Member for Waterford had misconstrued an observation he had made the previous day with regard to the Congested Districts Board. He (Mr. Wyndham) said that the Congested Districts Board had been able to buy untenanted land, although the Estates Commissioners had not, but he did not say they had been able to buy as much untenanted land as they might otherwise have bought. Their income was limited, and they had gone as far as it was safe to go in the direction of purchasing land without the assistance of the bonus in respect of untenanted land. In that respect alone the Act of last year had made a great difference. From the year 1888 to 1903, fifteen years, the total amount of money expended by the Congested Districts Board in the purchase of land was only £441,000, whereas in the nine months since the passing of the Act they had almost concluded purchases amounting to £545,000.

The difficulty was not that landlords in the West of Ireland were unwilling to sell untenanted land. He did not think they would get land cheaper or quicker if they acquired it by compulsory means. It would be most inexpedient to introduce compulsory powers of purchase in congested districts. When they were dealing with people who were willing to sell it would not assist the matter to threaten to take the land by force. Apart from that, it would take longer to put compulsory powers in force. What was often described as a refusal on the part of the landlord to sell really meant that the transaction was a complicated one, and it was found an uncommonly difficult thing to bring back the evicted tenants. In such cases, he thought it was the better course for the whole estate to be sold to the Estates Commissioners, and for them to take the responsibility of dividing the untenanted land. It had been suggested that Lord Lansdowne opposed the provisions of the Act for the reinstatement of the evicted tenants; but Lord Lansdowne did more perhaps in the House of Lords than anyone to get these provisions carried as an element in the compromise. There was another element of the compromise, and that was that no pressure, direct or indirect, was to be brought to bear upon any person occupying a farm from which others had been evicted. He knew of no case of a landlord having proceeded for a hanging gale, but such a case would, in his opinion, involve a departure from the spirit of the Land Conference. On the other hand, he had heard that in some cases tenants had suddenly ceased to pay rent, or required a large reduction, coupled with other terms. Either of those departures from the spirit of the Land Conference was to be deplored, deprecated, and reprobated by those who trusted to the Act of last year was a solution of the land question. He had been asked whether the Estates Commissioners had power to buy the interest of farmers occupying holdings from which tenants had been evicted. He thought they had.

MR. KILBRIDE: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what initiative the Estates Commissioners take?

MR. WYNDHAM: The question of initiative is a question of fact and expediency. As I said before, it is not my intention to make a long speech upon this occasion. This Bill is only intended to confirm the decision at which Parliament arrived last year, and, if it is not passed, the whole of the operations of the Act of last year will, I fear, be largely impeded in the future, almost arrested, more particularly in respect of remedying congestion and of restoring evicted tenants to their holdings.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he had listened to the debate with much sympathy, but with some sadness. The Irish land question since the Act of 1881 had pursued a sort of normal course. They had endeavoured to improve Mr. Gladstone's legislation, and side by side with that they had endeavoured to improve the position of the tenant. That debate, however, seemed to him to have entirely ignored in many respects the basis on which the legislation of last year proceeded, and, to a certain extent, to give the go-by to Mr. Gladstone's legislation. The Amendment was put before the House as having the warranty of a National Convention. Let them contrast the terms in which it was proposed, however moderate, and some of the speeches which had been made in support of it, with the manner in which the Land Act was received by the responsible Members of the Irish Party in their organisation in September last year. He had just been out and got the resolution which hailed the passing of the Act which was now being criticised, and which was passed at a meeting presided over by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford and attended by twenty-one of his colleagues, some of whom had spoken in the House to-day. He was not finding fault with the speeches; he thought that there was great ground for the disappointment that had been expressed. But he would remind them of the resolution passed on 8th September, 1903, at a meeting of the National Convention, presided over by the hon. Member for Waterford, which was as follows—

> "That we welcome in the new Land Act the most substantial victory gained for centuries by the Irish race for the reconquest of the soil of Ireland by the people, and the disbanding of the alien garrison which has been hitherto employed by England for the maintenance of a pernicious and irresponsible class ascendency, and we look to the successful working of the new measure for the creation of a new state of things in which all Irishmen, irrespective of class or creed, will have a hand in labouring unitedly for the national rights and happiness of our country."

Here was another resolution—

> "That, while the Act, as placed on the Statute-book, falls short in various important particulars of the recommendations of the Land Conference and the requirements of the national demand for the extinction of landlordism within a reasonable time, we cordially recognise that the Amendments demanded by the National Convention have been conceded in Committee to an extent to which no Government measure in relation to Ireland has ever before been modified in deference to the demands of Irish Nationalist opinion."

That was a recognition of the action of the House of Commons such as he had never known before on the part of any Irish Nationalist organisation.

> "We think it a duty to make a free acknowledgment that, next to the exertions of the United Irish Party, under the leadership of Mr. Redmond and Mr. T. W. Russell, the happiest result is to be traced to the wisdom and active good will displayed by that section of the landlord leaders which made the Land Conference possible, to the loyalty with which Mr. Wyndham, and his associates in the Government of Ireland, endeavoured to make good his pledges to give legislative effect to the wishes of the Conference, as well as to the high public spirit with which the Liberal Party resisted the temptation to extract any Party advantage from the situation."

That was butter all round. That was the orthodoxy of September last, but what was the orthodoxy of July? Let them contrast the orthodoxy of September last with the orthodoxy of July, as voiced in this Amendment. What had brought about the change? When an Irish National Convention was given as the warranty for this Amendment, he could not forget that he had the honour to stand alone in that House in consequence of the mandate of a National Convention which expelled him from the Irish Party. In consequence of what had happened, he sincerely thanked that Convention. In his judgment, if he had been present in the Irish Party for the last three or four years, he should have saved the Irish farmers £20,000,000. [NATIONALIST cries of "No, no!"]

MR. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): What about the Morley property?

MR. T. M. HEALY said the Resolution proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford declared—

> "That no measure dealing with the Amendment of the Irish Land Act of 1903 can be accepted as satisfactory which deals only with facilitating Irish landlords in obtaining the bonus, and which provides no remedy for the grave defects of that Act affecting Irish tenants, particularly the creation of a system of zones leading to the unjust inflation of prices."

The system of zones, of which they now heard in the Amendment, was never heard of until the Land Conference made its report—never mentioned in Irish politics; yet it was on account of that system of zones, invented by the signatories of the Conference, that he was asked to vote against this Bill. He declined to do so; he intended to vote for this Bill, and he would tell the House why. He disliked the system of bonus, and believed it was working, so far as the Land Judge's Court was concerned, to the enormous enhancement of their property. He intended, therefore, when this Bill reached Committee, to endeavour to provide that no landlord selling his estate in Judge Ross's Court should get any bonus whatever. He thought that was the true solution of the enormous inflation of prices which had taken place. Hon. Members came forward there who were themselves taking their property out of Judge Ross's Court, where it would have been sold, under the 40th section, for eighteen years purchase—[Nationalist cries of "Order"]—instead of twenty-four-and-a-half. [Interruption.] He would like to know why the hon. Member for Kildare was not interrupted when he talked about headlines. Those Gentlemen who interrupted him evidently did not like that mention of twenty-four-and-a-half years purchase, yet these (pointing to his colleagues) were the Gentlemen who moved and supported the Amendment. ["Order."] It was the hon. Member for Waterford who had set a headline to the landlords of Ireland in asking twenty-four-and-a-half years purchase. ["Order."] He hoped Irish tenants would take note. [Loud cries of "Order."]

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! I did not interrupt the hon. Member, because he has said nothing out of order. Anything short of that hon. Members should allow him to say.

Mr. T. M. HEALY, who was greeted with renewed Nationalist cries of "Order, order!" said that in spite of the efforts of his colleagues to prevent him, he should say what he liked.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): You will not say what you like here.

Mr. T. M. Healy.

Mr. T. M. HEALY, proceeding, said he attributed and ascribed to these Gentlemen in the House of Commons——

Mr. LUNDON: Who sold the Morley property for twenty-seven years purchase? [Nationalist interruptions and cries of "Answer that."]

Mr. T. M. HEALY suggested that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into this matter of how the Morley property was sold and how the Redmond property was sold. He should be quite prepared to defend his action before such a Committee, and the hon. and learned Member for Waterford could do the same. He had no fear as to the result, as far as he was concerned. Having dealt with this betrayal of the Irish Party—[Cries of "Order" and "Withdraw 'Betrayal.'"]

Mr. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is an organised attempt to prevent the hon. Member from being heard. [Interruption.]

*Mr. SPEAKER: I have called upon hon. Members to listen to the observations made by the hon. Member with courtesy, however heartily they may disagree with them. It is the duty of Members of this House to do so—a duty which hon. Members on the Irish Benches themselves always try to exact from hon. Members sitting opposite.

Mr. T. M. HEALY, whose remarks were almost inaudible owing to disorderly shouts from the Irish Benches, was understood to say that the policy adopted by the Irish Party would increase the rates and taxes in Ireland, and he was satisfied that it was only by a system of adequately taxing grass lands that this inflation of land values could be effectively prevented. The question of the grass lands in the West of Ireland was one which required immediate attention. He foresaw that whether it was done by this Government or some succeeding Government some attempt would have to be made to deal with the grass lands in Ireland. He strongly resented the action of hon. Members who, while condemning the exorbitant demands made on behalf of the owners of estates in Ireland in regard to the sale of their land, themselves approved and accepted high prices for their own land. [Renewed disorderly interruptions from the IRISH Benches and MINISTERIAL cries of "Order, order!"] One remedy for this difficulty could be found by the imposition of an adequate system of local taxation. [NATIONALIST cries of "Divide, divide."] In addition to that he held the opinion that an adequate stamp duty should be placed upon ejectments and notices to quit. He thought it was a monstrous thing that while a tenant had to pay from £2 to £3 on going into the Land Court a landlord should be able to obtain a notice to quit and only have to pay half-a-crown for the stamp duty. He was of opinion, therefore, that one of the most effective methods of dealing with the agrarian problem in the future would be by means of fiscal proposals in the Budget Bill. It was only by that means that they could ever hope to bring adequate pressure to bear on the landowners in Ireland. In the past the landlords had only been able to obtain from seventeen to eighteen years purchase and now the Nationalist Party were approving of twenty-four-and-a-half years purchase. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: You will get a job after this, and cries of "You will get a judgeship," and "Judge Healy."] By adopting this course Nationalist Members had befooled their country and betrayed the Irish Party.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Why do not you go on the other side?

MR. T. M. HEALY said he had used exactly the same language before his constituency, and he should not shrink from repeating it in the House of Commons.

MR. CULLINAN (Tipperary, S.): Why do not you go to Ireland and say that?

MR. T. M. HEALY again addressed the House, but from this point the remainder of the hon. Member's speech was rendered nearly inaudible by disorderly cries from the Nationalist Benches, such as "Traitor," "Dublin Castle," "Omagh," and "Coward."

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) in supporting the Bill, said the debate had ended in a manifestation which illustrated the justice of their objection to an Irish Home Rule Parliament.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Thomas Esmonde and Captain Donelan.

Bill accordingly read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

SAVINGS BANKS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment proposed [17th June] to the Bill on Consideration, as amended (by the Standing Committee).

Which Amendment was—

"In page 1, line 21, to leave out Clause 3."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Other Amendments made to the Bill.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

THE LICENSING BILL.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Sir A. ACLAND-HOOD, Somersetshire, Wellington), in moving the adjournment of the House, announced that the Committee on the Licensing Bill would be the First Order on Monday, and that Monday would be the second allotted day.

CHINESE COOLIES IN THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it was true, as stated in a telegram published that morning, that two coolies had escaped from the compound at Johannesburg, were captured at Pretoria, and bought back in custody; was it true that those men had tried to escape only a few hours after they had landed and had been placed in such favourable conditions as the right hon. Gentleman had described in his speeches; also what was the meaning of the word "captured"? It seemed a curious word in connection with indentured labourers.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): I have no information on the subject.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: You ought to have information. [Laughter and cries of "Order."]

MR. LYTTELTON: Neither do I consider it convenient that I should be asked to express my views about the terms of a telegram of which I have no knowledge.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will you telegraph to Lord Milner?

MR. LYTTELTON: No, I do not think it necessary.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: That is just what I wanted you to say.

Adjourned at four minutes before Six o'clock till Monday next.

POLICE CONSTABLE ANDERSON.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I beg to give notice that I propose to-morrow to ask His Majesty's Government whether they will lay on the Table of the House any Papers or correspondence which it may be in their opinion right to lay, on the subject of Police-Constable Anderson, of the Royal Irish Constabulary. May I also add that it is not my intention to raise any discussion upon that notice, but I think that, inasmuch as the information which we have received is entirely unauthentic, it is desirable that such Papers as are available should be laid on the Table of the House.

THE MILITIA.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I hope that the reasonableness of the Motion I have placed on the Notice Paper and the necessity for what it proposes will induce your Lordships to give it favourable consideration. My Motion reads: "To move to resolve, That this House, while reaffirming the Resolution passed by the Lords in 1883, 'That having regard to the present defective military organisation, and to the great importance of the Militia Force, it is essential that the Militia should be forthwith recruited up to its established strength,' is further of opinion that so long as the Militia continues to be, as it now is, the constitutional basis of our existing military system, it should be so raised as not to compete for voluntary recruits, as it now does, with the Regular Army to the great detriment of the military forces of the Crown." Your Lordships will observe that the first part of the Motion is an historical statement of what passed in 1883, but it does not say that the Resolution which is quoted here was carried in the teeth of the combined opposition of the two Front Benches. It was carried, my Lords, by the independent, patriotic action of your Lordships, to which again, under like circumstances, I intend to appeal. The latter part of my Motion says that the Militia is the constitutional basis of our existing military system ?

Now what is our existing military system ? It is a system which is, I think, absolutely perfect, having regard to our insular position. It is this, that you have an Army raised by voluntary enlistment which is ready to go anywhere and everywhere out of the United Kingdom where wanted and, on the other hand, you have a Militia which is raised by compulsion—that is the history of the Militia; raised properly by compulsion—for home service, and for home service alone. That Militia is capable, though raised only for home defence, of volunteering as regiments for foreign service, or the men may individually go into the Army. The third element of our military system is the Volunteer Force, and that force originally consisted of those who volunteered rather than run the chance of the Militia ballot. I need not tell your Lordships that the existing system is not enforced, that the foundation and basis of it, a Militia raised by compulsion, is a dead letter. It is not so raised. The foundation of our military system is every year broken up by a special Act which suspends the ballot for the Militia.

Now, my Lords, what is the state of the Militia ? In 1883, when your Lordships passed the Resolution I have read, the state of the Militia was as follows:—Establishment, 128,069; enrolled, 104,431; wanting, 23,638; under nineteen, 15,904; struck off as absent, 6,904; Army Militia Reserve, 26,692; a further reduction of one-fifth for casualties and artillery, left infantry, rank and file, above nineteen years of age, 36,638. The state of things on the whole has been the same throughout - there has always been a deficiency in the Militia of from 20,000 to 30,000 men. And why, my Lords ? Because, as I have said, the foundation and basis of our military system is annually broken up.

What is the conclusion come to on this question by the Duke of Norfolk's Commission, who were appointed to inquire into the organisation, numbers, and terms of service of our Militia and Volunteer Forces, and to report whether any, and if any, what changes are required in order to secure that these forces shall be maintained in a condition of military efficiency and at an adequate strength ? The conclusion they have come to is that it is through compulsion, and compulsion alone, that you can get a satisfactory Force for home defence. Thus, in concluding their Report they say that—

> "A home defence army capable, in the absence of the Regular Forces, of protecting the country against invasion can be raised and maintained only on the principle that it is the duty of every citizen of military age to be trained for the national defence and take a part in it should emergency arise."

I would personally thank the noble Duke and his colleagues who sat on the Commission for the splendid courage they showed in bringing up this recommendation. They have been accussed of exceeding the terms of the Warrant under which they were appointed, but they did nothing of the kind. They found in the course of their inquiry that everything was unsatisfactory, that it was not a case of doing this or that little thing to bring the force to a condition of military efficiency and adequate strength, but that the whole basis was wrong, and they had the courage to say so. They deserve our thanks for putting forward the view which I think to be the right view, and for having the courage to tell the nation the truth.

The Report of the Commission has been received in a way that is not to the credit of this country. It has been universally abused, and if anybody wants to know what was said about it they have only to read a most interesting article in the Nineteenth Century and After by a great military critic, but not a politician—Colonel Lonsdale Hale. The title of his article is "Our Pitiable Military Situation," and in it he shows how unjust has been the action and the language used towards the Duke of Norfolk's Commission. This brings me to the question of compulsory service. In the opinion of the Duke of Norfolk's Commission it is only thus that our military forces can be put on a right foundation, but, as I have said, this is denounced in every possible way, and by no one has this question of compulsory service been so strongly denounced as by an old brother officer of mine, Colonel Sir Howard Vincent, in a letter in The Times.

Colonel Sir Howard Vincent had the audacity—there is no other word fully expressing it, and it is a word I have used to his face—to say that all those who are in favour of compulsory service are foolish persons. I naturally wrote to The Times, asking my friend to name these foolish persons. He declined to answer my letter, and as far as he is concerned, these foolish persons are unnamed. But I thought it right to endeavour to find out, as far as I could, who these foolish persons were, and I hold in my hand a list containing their names. I begin in 1804 with Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt; Then comes Lord Sidmouth in 1807; Sir James Graham's Committee on Army Organisation in 1860; The Duke of Wellington, Lord Palmerston, and the Recruiting Commission in 1867; Lord Dalhousie in 1867; Lord Longford in 1867; Sir James Scarlett in 1870; Mr. Cardwell in 1871; Earl Russell in 1871; Lord Sandhurst in 1871; and the last authority is the noble Marquessthe present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The noble Marquess in 1900 introduced a Bill to bring the Militia ballot up to date, but it is lying derelict, a dead letter, and we were told by the late Under-Secretary of State for War that it would require some sixty or seventy more clauses to make it work. These are some of the "foolish persons" referred to by Sir Howard Vincent. But you have besides that, the evidence given before the Duke of Norfolk's Commission, and I think my noble friend, Lord Newton, did good service in writing to The Times, giving a summary of the names and evidence of the witnesses who were in favour of compulsory service. The names were Sir T. Kelly-Kenny, Earl Roberts, Viscount Wolseley, Sir John French, Sir John Ardagh, Lord Castletown, Sir Evelyn Wood, Sir H. Hildyard, and Sir William Parr; and among others were Lord Raglan, a former Under-Secretary of State for War who is opposed to the ballot, but is one of those who are in favour of compulsory service. In addition compulsory service is supported by eminent business men, employers of labour, Volunteer officers, and others. I think it would be as well at this stage that I should read to the House the names of the members of the Norfolk Commission. The Commission was composed as follows:—The Duke of Norfolk, Chairman; The Duke of Richmond and Gordon, the Earl of Derby (a former Secretary of State for War), Lord Grenfell, Sir Coleridge Grove, Sir Ralph Henry Knox, Colonel George O'Callaghan-Westropp, Colonel Evan H. Llewellyn, Colonel E. Satterthwaite, Colonel James A. Dalmahoy, and Mr. Henry Spenser Wilkinson

The Earl of Wemyss.

Now, my Lords, with such evidence as is before them, and knowing as the Government do that all their difficulties as regards the Army would disappear if they only had the courage to enforce the existing law, why is it that they do not enforce it? There are two reasons—first the existence of the Navy; and, secondly, what is more important still, the existence of the voter. The idea of what is called the "blue water school," is that if you have a powerful Navy you want nothing more; that you may be subject to small raids, but not to serious invasion. I hold in my hand a quotation giving the views of Mr. Pitt on this very point a century ago, for there were also at that time men who held the view of the blue water school. Mr. Pitt abused the Government for their insufficient action, and proceeded—

> "What, then, are we to think of Ministers who, with such an opportunity of observation, overlooked renewing the ballot for that important part of our force, the Militia, during peace."

Could anything, my Lords, after a hundred years be more applicable than that to the state of things existing to-day? Then Mr. Pitt went on to speak of Bonaparte's preparations for invasion and of our 184,000 men in the Army and 400,000 Volunteers and our naval means — Nelson was then alive — as being insufficient for our defence. I turn from Mr. Pitt to what was said by

> "I think it would be living in a fool's paradise were the English people to depend exclusively on the Navy for the defence of this country from invasion."

Later on Lord Wolseley said —

> "To depend upon the Navy alone for the defence of this country, and to forego having an Army on that account, would be the madness we are told in ancient writings the gods used to send to those whom they wished to destroy. Those who believe and preach that, preach what is the most injurious doctrine the English people could hear."

The same language was used by Lord Palmerston, who stated that the men who thought we could rely, even in this nautical country, upon the Navy alone for home defence were simply mad; and I doubt not that if now alive he would call the "Blue Water" school the "Blue Bedlamites." So much for this question in the past.

I asked the noble Earl the First Lord of the Admiralty two years ago whether he thought we could trust to the Navy alone for defence, and he replied that I had put a conundrum to him that it would take all the debating societies in England two or three years to answer. When I saw the name of the noble Earl among those who had given evidence before the Duke of Norfolk's Commission, I thought I should find an answer to that question; but, from first to last, there was not a single question put to the First Lord as to the Navy. He spoke as a Colonel of Militia, and not as First Lord. I quite understand why the Commission did not put any questions to the noble Earl with regard to the Navy. It was because when they asked for evidence from the Admiralty it was denied them, and in the same way evidence was denied them from the Defence Committee. Therefore, we get nothing from the First Lord of the Admiralty with reference to the efficiency of the Navy on this point. As I have said, Lord Wolseley agrees with Lord Palmerston and others that those men are mad who think we can trust to the Navy alone.

It is always said that the people of this country would not stand the foreign form of conscription. No one asks them to stand it. All that is asked for is that the English system of raising Militia in this country which is already on the Statute-book may be put in force. Nobody asks for more. I hold that the language that is used is a libel—nothing less—on our nation. When you want it, and think it is of use, you then speak and boast, as you did in the days of the late war, of the patriotism of the people; you then went down on your knees, with 5s. a day in your hand, to men who had never been across a horse, and asked them to become Yeomen, and many of them did and performed excellent service. Therefore, when it suits you, you trade upon their patriotism, but when it does not suit you and you think you run the danger of losing votes by doing your duty, you abstain from doing it and say that the people would not stand compulsory service for home defence. I maintain that that is a libel on the people of our country, and I want to know on what authority those who make that statement base it.

For the last forty years I have spoken in favour of compulsory service everywhere, and I have never heard a whisper of dissent. Further, I tested the feelings of the country in a way that cannot be denied. I sent out two year ago a circular, on the one hand to Lords-Lieutenant of counties, chairmen of county councils, chairmen of quarter sessions, chairmen of chambers of agriculture, chairmen of chambers of commerce, and, on the other hand, to mayors, provosts, and chief magistrates of cities and burghs. I may say that 400 circulars went out, and between 200 and 300 replies were received. The questions I put were (1) Whether, in their opinion, the present state of our home defence was satisfactory and reliable? To which question 75 per cent. replied "No;" and (2) Whether in their opinion the nation would, for home defence only, accept a modified form of compulsory service? To which question two to one answered "Yes." From those replies I am justified in declaring that the statement that the people of this country are so unpatriotic as to refuse to accept compulsory service, when told it is necessary, is a libel on the nation.

When I was examined before the Duke of Norfolk's Commission I was asked by Sir Ralph Knox, an old friend of mine—

> "But would not what you propose be unpopular?"

Do not forget, my Lords, that he was one of the Commissioners who signed the Report in favour of compulsory service. Indeed, the general principle that there should be compulsory service was agreed upon unanimously by the Commissioners. My answer to him was—

> "It does not matter whether it is popular or unpopular; if it is right it should be done."

During sixty-two years of public life I have never known a Government come forward on their own responsibility and ask either for money or for men or whatever was required for the safety of the nation and be refused what they asked. We are on the eve of an utterance in another place from the Secretary of State for War as to what this recondite Army reform measure is on which there has been so much dispute, and we are to begin this last form of reform as late as 14th July, when the session has nearly gone. I know that His Majesty's Government are not going to have anything in the shape of compulsory service, because when I was asked if I would put this Motion off I said that if the Government would give me an assurance that compulsory service formed part of the new scheme I——

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Earl of DONOUGHMORE): The noble Earl's request was for an assurance that the ballot formed part of the new scheme.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: The noble Earl thinks, perhaps, that the ballot is more severe than compulsory service.

*THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: I think it different.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: The ballot is an alleviation of it. In foreign countries the whole nation is liable to conscription, but we do not require that. But, at any rate, I am assured that compulsion in no form constitutes part of the Government measure. I am inclined to think, however, that there must be something in what we hear about the reduction of the forces, Militia and others, for on 28th June the Secretary of State for War and the Prime Minister both showed that they had been nobbled, captured, got hold of, by the blue water school of thought. They spoke in favour of money being given to the Navy rather than spent on our land forces. And it looks to me as if there is some truth, too, in the statement that this scheme, whatever it may be, does not meet with the approval of non-political experts. I hold in my hand an extract from a speech by Sir Neville Lyttelton, who, as your Lordships know full well, is the military adviser to and the first military officer on the Defence Committee, of which, I think very wrongly, the Prime Minister of the day is to be the head. I venture to think that is a great mistake; but I do not wish to discuss it now. I think the Prime Minister ought to be out of all that, leaving the Cabinet to say whether what is proposed by the Defence Committee is right or wrong. Speaking at the South African dinner, at which the Duke of Marlborough presided, Sir Neville Lyttelton said—

> "The British Army was in the smelting-pot again; it had been there very often. He hoped that the scheme to be promulgated next week would please the public. Sometimes he had some misgivings, and doubts arose in his mind. They did their best, but it was making bricks without straw."

I leave the House to say what that want of straw is. Sir Neville Lyttelton continued—

> "This year money was short and men were short both in numbers and stature. They had done their best with regard to the scheme, but he was not happy—far from it."

My Lords, I cannot do better, I think, than close my remarks with these words, these very comforting words, from the officer who, above all others, has been chosen to represent the Army on the Defence Committee. I hope they will give comfort to your Lordships. I have no doubt they do to those who sit on the Government Bench. I also hope they will induce your Lordships, as they ought to do, to support the Motion that I now humbly move.

Moved to resolve: "That this House, while reaffirming the Resolution passed by the Lords in 1883, 'That having regard to the present defective military organisation, and to the great importance of the Militia Force, it is essential that the Militia should be forthwith recruited up to its established strength,' is further of opinion that so long as the Militia continues to be, as it now is, the constitutional basis of our existing military system it should be so raised as not to compete for voluntary recruits, as it now does, with the Regular Army to the great detriment of the military forces of the Crown."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

LORD NEWTON: My Lords, lest there should be any doubt as to whether the noble Earl will receive any support, I rise at once to assure him that I, at all events, will go into the lobby in support of his Motion. Neither do I see any reason why the Motion should not be supported by the votes of every Member present who is in favour of maintaining the Militia. The Motion does not commit anyone to the particular nostrum favoured by the noble Earl, and those persons who are in favour of the continuance of the Militia can vote for the Motion with a clear conscience. The other day my noble friend the Under-Secretary of State for War, expatiated with, I thought, some envy on the peculiarly favourable position which is occupied by my noble friend Lord Wemyss. It appears to me that on this particular occasion he enjoys a more favourable position than ever, because he has every right to count upon the support of the Government.

I do not think that sufficient recognition has ever been paid to the dealings of this Government and of the last Government with regard to the Militia, and I think it just as well to refresh the memory of the House upon this subject. In 1899 the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs introduced a Militia Ballot Bill. The next year the noble Earl opposite, Lord Wemyss, brought in the same Bill and was opposed not only by the Government but by the Front Opposition Bench. As a rule, I believe the theory of legislation is that when a Government Bill is introduced it represents the settled convictions of Ministers and the collective policy of the Government; but in this particular case we must adopt a totally different theory. The theory I have in my mind with regard to this particular Bill is that it was introduced much on the same principle as that on which the drunken helot used to be introduced at Spartan feasts—as an object to be avoided. This is a species of legislation which might be defined as legislation by scarecrow.

I confess that anything which is brought forward by my noble friend stands a very poor chance of acceptance in this House. The two Front Benches invariably combine against him, and I have before expressed the opinion that if the noble Earl brought forward a Motion that two and two made four, or that the earth was round, the two Front Benches would unite and say they made something totally different, or that the earth was flat Therefore, any Motion proposed by the noble Earl is foredoomed to failure. He is looked upon, in fact, by both Front Benches as a sort of hostis humani generis. For my part, though I may be singular in my views, I maintain that the proposals brought forward by the noble Earl are infinitely more practicable and more definite than all the recommendations of your Hartington Commission, your Dawkins Commission, your Esher Committee, and your Elgin Commission. With the one exception of the Commission presided over by the Duke of Norfolk, the recommendations brought forward have been recommendations for the improvement, reorganisation, and what they call the "co-ordination" of our military system. Practically they deal with nothing but War Office reorganisation.

My noble friend, whether you agree with him or not, goes to the root of the matter, and proposes a definite solution, inasmuch as he puts forward a really solid basis upon which the military edifice may be constructed. I do not propose on this occasion to repeat the arguments which have already been used in this House by myself and others on the subject of compulsion. I have no doubt we shall have many future opportunities of returning to this subject, but I do not think anybody present can be in any sort of doubt as to the actual value of the Militia and as to the inestimable value which it has been to us in the past. If you only take the late war as an instance, I think any impartial person would be bound to admit that the services of the other two branches of the Auxiliary Forces, that is to say, the Volunteers and the Yeomanry, cannot be compared for one moment with the services rendered by the Militia. The Militia sent something like 100,000 men to the war, and I will go so far as to say this, that if it had not been for the existence of the Militia, I do not believe it would have been possible for us to have carried on that war at all, because, as everybody knows, they took the place of the Regular Army when we had sent every available man to South Africa.

But if anybody feels any doubt as to the relative value of the various portions of the Auxiliary Forces, it can very soon be demonstrated if you take, for instance, the test of embodiment. You would then realise the infinite superiority of the Militia over the other two branches. We know, not only from speeches which have been delivered in this House, but also in consequence of the Report of the Duke of Norfolk's Commission, that in the opinion of those who have had the best opportunities of studying this question, the Militia can only be kept up by resorting in some form or other to compulsion. My noble friend the Under-Secretary of State for War, speaking the other day in your Lordships' House, strongly repudiated the idea of compulsion, and, with an ingenuity which really would have done credit to the oldest Parliamentary hand, he actually established a difference, a most important difference, between the principle of the Militia ballot and the principle of universal service. I admit at once that my intelligence is not sufficiently nimble to follow my noble friend through these distinctions. Personally, I see very little difference between the two things, but I do not despair of my noble friend. When the day arrives, some years, or possibly, some months hence, when we migrate to the other side, I entertain a faint hope that I shall hear my noble friend pointing out to his successor on this Bench that the one absolutely necessary thing in order to put our military affairs in order is to resort to the principle of compulsion. [The Earl of DONOUGHMORE dissented.] The fact is, the principle of compulsion is receiving allies from the most unexpected quarters.

The noble Earl who moved the Motion now before your Lordships has drawn attention to a most important speech which was delivered last week by General Sir Neville Lyttelton. I was prepared to read a number of extracts from this speech, but, as Lord Wemyss has done so, I will not trouble the House with them. I must, however, draw attention to one particular phrase. General Lyttelton, after stating that he felt no confidence whatever in the coming scheme, stated that he did not like the French word "conscription," and preferred to use the English words, "compulsory service"; and, referring to compulsory service, he said he disagreed with the Norfolk Commission, who wanted compulsory service for home defence. The only explanation you can put upon this is that Sir Neville Lyttelton wants it for foreign service. I believe he has already withdrawn some of his expressions, but the most important part of his speech was the sentence with which he concluded—

> "When I speak of even a modified form of compulsory service I am not speaking as an official, but it will come one of these days."

That is what we have to bear in mind. Whether he approves of it or not we know what he anticipates. General Lyttelton is not only a very highly distinguished soldier; he is the first military member of the Army Council, and he is practically our English Chief of the Staff. He announced that he was only speaking for himself. I contend that a man in his position is quite unable to speak for himself in his private capacity. This is not an utterance of an irresponsible person.

General Lyttelton is not a man who can be described as rash or indiscreet. His words must inevitably carry great weight, not only in Parliament, but throughout the country; and what do they mean? Well, they mean this, either that he despairs of solving the military problem, or that he thinks the coming scheme is based upon the probability of its popularity in the country rather than upon securing the national safety. In any case, I am sorry to say that this speech suggests that as much indecision, if not chaos, prevails under the present conditions at the War Office as in former days; and with regard to what is now taking place at the War Office, I cannot help being reminded of that phrase which I have often heard applied to continually changing French Governments, "plus cela change plus c'est la même chose."

I am not one of those persons who have habitually abused the War Office. I have never indulged in what I have always thought has been senseless abuse of the War Office, because I think it absurd to charge the War Office with the shortcomings of our military administration; but I do not think anyone, however ignorant, can fail to recognise the want of purpose, the want of decision, and the want of a definite policy which characterise the management of our military affairs. We have within a very recent period witnessed the introduction and the abandonment of a most ambitious and far-reaching scheme. We learn from the Duke of Norfolk's Commission that not so long ago the Defence Committee had no clear idea of the purpose for which the Militia and Volunteers existed. We witnessed quite recently the Prime Minister appointing a Commission to deal with this most important question, and then airily, and probably without having read the evidence, saying he would not have anything to do with their recommendations. And now, to crown it all, we have the First Military Lord practically throwing over the Secretary of State for War.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE: My Lords, we are indebted to the noble Earl for bringing this question to the notice of your Lordships' House. Speaking as a Militia officer, I can say that all the members of the force, officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, will be glad to think they have the noble Earl as the champion of their cause. We have in this House several noble Lords who are commanding officers of Militia, including two members of His Majesty's Government, and for that reason the Militia had every hope that their interests and welfare would be in good hands; but if rumour is true, that is not the case. We are told that the Secretary of State for War, with the sanction of His Majesty's Government, proposes to abolish the Militia altogether. If such is the case, I feel sure that most of your Lordships will agree with the statement which appeared in the Standard last week, to the effect that the idea of destroying the Militia will be received not so much with indignation as with astonishment that such a proposal could ever be seriously put forward by a responsible Government. I think I am perfectly justified in asking the noble Earl the Under-Secretary of State for War whether that rumour is true or not, and, if it is true, how it appeared in the newspapers—in the Standard and the Daily Express—before it was proclaimed to the world by the Secretary of State for War. No wonder the senior Military Lord on the War Office Council, when making a speech the other evening, said that his mind was uneasy. It is perfectly true, as he stated, that the Army at the present moment is not only short of men, but that the men are short in stature. If the Secretary of State for War thinks that that is going to be rectified by the abolition of the Militia, I think it will be some time before the mind of the gallant officer to whom I have referred is made any easier. Until I hear it officially announced I shall refuse to believe the astounding rumour that the Militia is to be abolished.

Personally, I am in favour of compulsory service. I am not, however, a supporter of the ballot; and I would remind the House that the Duke of Norfolk's Commission declared that compulsory service for home defence is preferable to the ballot. I concur with the noble Earl in his tribute to the members of this Commission. I think they deserve the gratitude of the nation for speaking the plain truth, and telling the people that the country is, so far as its defence is concerned, living in a fool's paradise. The noble Duke told us the other day that that was the reason why all the members of his Commission were unanimous in saying there must be compulsory service of some kind.

When a fortnight ago my noble friend Lord Newton called attention to the Report of the Esher Committee, the only noble Lord, other than the two members of the Government, who spoke against compulsory service was the noble and gallant Lord who commands the Gloucestershire Militia. The noble and gallant Lord said he did not think the country was ripe for such a system. I believe that if the change is not necessary now, it never will be. The opinion of Lord Bathurst is not the opinion of most commanding officers of Militia. He will find that most of them agree with the Duke of Richmond, who commands a Militia regiment and was one of those who signed the Report of the Norfolk Commission favouring compulsory service. I think Militia officers would rather take the opinion of the noble Duke, who has had longer experience in the Militia, than that of the noble Lord. On the other hand, however, the noble Lord (Earl Bathurst) has on his side the Under-Secretary of State for War. The Under-Secretary stated the other day that his reason for opposing compulsory service was that it would involve considerable expenditure, but that does not agree with the Report of the Duke of Norfolk's Commission, for they stated that, after having gone thoroughly into the subject, they considered that under compulsory service the expenditure would be a great deal less than at present.

Another reason given by the Under-Secretary for opposing compulsory service was the difficulty of getting skilled instructors. Surely that is a matter for legislation. If other countries who go in for compulsory service are able to find instructors, surely they could be found in this country. In the same speech the noble Earl the Under-Secretary said that if we were to lose command of the sea, we would be well advised to lay down our arms and sue for peace with the enemy—a proposal which, if I may say so without offence to the noble Earl, would be scorned and repudiated by every man calling himself an Englishman. I would prefer to rely upon the noble and patriotic instincts of the people, well drawn out in the cartoon in Punch last week, where we find a humourist not afraid to put the truth, which is that an island Power should organise its forces on the basis of national duty. This is an example which we have received from our ally Japan. The lesson that is taught us surely gives ample food for reflection, especially when we think that in this vast population of ours only one man out of every ten does any actual service for his country.

We have learned in South Africa that modern war is a scientific matter. We therefore do not want men who, when emergency arises, rush to arms and become food for powder. The day of putting a pike in a man's hand at the last moment has long since gone by. For this reason we require the best of the manhood of the nation, not the men we have been getting of late, and they can only be obtained, in my opinion, by some form of compulsory service. I know one of the great arguments against compulsory service is that if we had such service for home defence, we would not get the men for our volunteer Army to serve abroad and in India. In my opinion we would get men to join the Army then who had never thought of joining it before, in the same way as many men who are in the Army now have gone in through the Militia and would never have gone into the Army if there had not been a Militia Force. This is only the second time that I have had the honour of addressing your Lordships' House, and I thank you for the indulgence you have granted to me. I felt that in the circumstances it was my duty, as an officer commanding a Militia battalion, to raise my voice in support of the noble Lord's Motion.

EARL BATHURST: My Lords, I had not intended to address your Lordships to-night, and I only rise to say two or three words in answer to the remarks of my noble friend who has just sat down. He referred to a speech I made some ten days ago, and I am afraid he drew a wrong impression from it. I did not say that I was not in favour of compulsion. I said that I thought the country was not ready and was not prepared to vote for compulsion. I am, on the whole, in favour of compulsion and still more in favour of the Militia ballot, and I shall have very great pleasure in supporting the Motion now before your Lordships' House.

LORD ROSMEAD: My Lords, the time has now arrived when something will have to be done as regards the old constitutional force. I thoroughly agree with every word that has been said by the noble Earl who so eloquently brought forward this Motion. It will be impossibe for the Militia to continue as it is now. As your Lordships are aware, it becomes weaker and weaker every year, and if the decrease continues it will in time cease to exist. I am sure your Lordships will agree with me when I say that it would be a serious loss to the nation if a force like the Militia, which has rendered such excellent service in the past, should cease to exist, and therefore I consider it essential that some drastic steps should be taken to ensnre its remaining a part of His Majesty's forces. The noble Earl, as I understand, is in favour of the ballot being amended and brought up to date so that it could be enforced. With that I entirely agree. I am not speaking without some experience of the Militia before going into the Regular Army, and I have had experience of it since. For at present I have the honour of holding a commission in that force.

The ballot is either a good or a bad substitute. If it is a bad one it should be repealed; if is a good one it should be applied; but as it is at present it is worse than useless. The ballot looks like the beginning of conscription or compulsory service, and, ugly as it may sound to a nation which has always prided itself on maintaining a voluntary Army, I venture to think the time is not far off when some form of modified compulsory service will have to be adopted if we are going to maintain such a strong and effective Army as is necessary. The time now appears to be ripe when a commencement should be made in that direction by enforcing ballot for the Militia, and I therefore trust your Lordships will support the Motion moved by the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: My Lords, I should, of course, be the very last to question the right of any Member of your Lordships' House to initiate a discussion upon any subject at any time; but still I cannot help thinking that my position is rather a difficult one this afternoon, and at the same time it is, certainly to myself, and possibly to noble Lords, rather an unsatisfactory one. Your Lordships are aware that the Prime Minister has made a statement this afternoon to the effect that the Secretary of State for War will make his statement upon a scheme of Army reform on Thursday next. Naturally I have no intention of saying anything this evening which would in any way foreshadow that statement, and I am sure that in saying that your Lordships will acquit me of any want of respect to the House. But when a big scheme of Army or any other reform is to be introduced it is only right that the principal Minister concerned should make his statement himself and should make it as a concrete whole. For this reason I would ask the noble Viscount behind me, Lord Hardinge, to be a little patient. He has accepted certain rumours that have been about during the last few days as gospel truth and has asked me for a categorical affirmation or denial. I would ask the noble Viscount, and I am sure he will meet me so far, to be patient until Thursday next, when he can hear the scheme of my right hon. friend in its completeness, and I am sure your Lordships will then be very glad to listen to any criticisms or remarks that he may have to make upon it.

As regards the Motion which is before us my noble friend Lord Newton said that anybody could vote for it, suggesting presumably that it really does not commit anybody to anything in particular, that it does not commit noble Lords who support it to compulsory service, to the ballot, or to anything else. It is perfectly true that the words of the Motion do not contain either the words compulsory service or the ballot, but still I think any noble Lord who is acquainted with the noble Earl, Lord Wemyss, knows perfectly well what was in his mind when he put this Motion down, and knows perfectly well, if he has read the report of the debate in 1883 which is referred to in the Motion, that after all it is to the principle of the ballot that the noble Earl wishes to commit the House; and noble Lords who go into the lobby with the noble Earl must do so with the full consciousness that they are pledging themselves to the ballot, and to the ballot definitely. Before passing on to the more general question I would ask to be allowed to say a word upon a speech that has been very much quoted—I refer to the speech made last week by my friend Sir Neville Lyttelton. The noble Lord behind me, Lord Newton, said that Sir Neville Lyttelton had already withdrawn part of that speech.

LORD NEWTON: He did so in a letter to the Westminster Gazette of Saturday.

*THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: I do not know anything about a letter in the Westminster Gazette, but I have here a copy of a letter published in the Standard, in which Sir Neville Lyttelton did not withdraw anything that he said, but repudiated the interpretation that had been put upon the speech in certain quarters, which is a very different story. Sir Neville Lyttelton has been quoted in your Lordships' House to-day and elsewhere as being in favour of compulsory service. The noble Earl, Lord Wemyss, quoted part of Sir Neville Lyttelton's speech, but did not quote one sentence, which, I think, is very germane to this discussion. It is a sentence towards the end of the speech. Sir Neville had already said that he preferred the words "compulsory service," to conscription, and he proceeded—

> "He did not now put it forward."

When Sir Neville Lyttelton says definitely that he does not now put the policy of compulsory service forward, it is not quite fair to claim him as being in the same camp as those who have been advocating compulsory service in your Lordships' House this evening. But I have gone further. I have seen Sir Neville Lyttelton twice upon this point and have ascertained his views a little more definitely than they are shown in the very different reports that there are of his speech as made the other night. I do not like quoting the opinion of any individual member of the Army Council, but I think your Lordships will realise that this is an exceptional occasion. Sir Neville Lyttelton authorises me to say that he recognises at once that public opinion is not in favour of any form of compulsory service.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Why?

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: I will prove that to the noble Earl before sitting down. Sir Neville Lyttelton recognises that public opinion is not in favour of any form of compulsory service, and, as he said in his speech, he has no desire to introduce it now. He does not like compulsion for its own sake, but he cannot keep out of his mind the possibility of some day being forced to adopt it. He is in favour of doing everything he can to avoid it.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: They have been doing that for forty years.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: And I hope they will continue doing it for another forty years. As I have said, Sir Neville Lyttelton is in favour of trying everything to avoid adopting it, and for that reason he entirely supports the scheme which will be put forward by my right hon. friend the Secretary of of State for War on Thursday next. That is what I am authorised by Sir Neville Lyttelton to say, and I think that statement will, perhaps, make matters clearer than they have been on this subject. To return to the question of compulsory service. My noble friend Lord Newton mentioned that I endeavoured the other day to prove to your Lordships that there was a great difference between compulsory service, as advocated by him and by the Norfolk Commission, and the ballot, and he said he was unable to follow my string of reasoning. If I remember rightly, I do not think I produced any string of reasoning. I produced a quotation from the evidence given before the Commission by the noble Earl Lord Wemyss, whom I recognised as the greatest living authority on the subject of the ballot.

LORD NEWTON: What the noble Earl argued was that Lord Methuen, who gave evidence in favour of the Militia ballot, was, in consequence of that, opposed to personal universal service.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: That was in another part of my speech. The noble Earl, Lord Wemyss, said most distinctly in his evidence:—

> "Universal obligation is alleviated by the chance selection of a few. Thus, the ballot is quite distinct from Continental universal conscription."

It was on that that I relied in claiming that there was an absolute difference between enforcing everybody to serve and the ballot. Viscount Hardinge and my noble friend Lord Newton said a great deal this afternoon upon the subject of compulsory service, but I claim that that has nothing whatever to do with what is advocated by the noble Earl in this Motion. We have already had a debate upon the subject of universal compulsory service as advocated by the Royal Commission, and if your Lordships choose to have another one I shall, of course, attempt to take my part in it; but I do not think it is necessary for me to go in any detail into the various arguments that have been brought forward on the subject this evening.

I will confine my attention more particularly to the ballot, which is advocated by Lord Wemyss. The noble Earl quoted a number of authorities as being in favour of the ballot. He read out as distinguished a list of names as could be found in English history. I should have thought, as regards some of the earlier names, that we might have claimed that conditions had changed a little. Mr. Pitt, after all, did not know what a battleship was that was driven by steam. But I do wish to draw your Lordships' attention to the last name quoted by the noble Lord, namely, that of my noble friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The noble Marquess's opinions are well known in your Lordships' House. I presume the noble Earl based his inclusion of the noble Marquess upon the fact that my noble friend introduced a Militia Ballot Bill two years ago, but, if I remember rightly, it was made perfectly clear on that occasion, and I think Lord Newton recognises that fact, that the Bill was simply brought in, if I may use a phrase I have heard used with considerable effect by Lord Ribblesdale, as a sort of pilot balloon. It was brought in as illustrating the form such a Bill should take if carried through Parliament. It was made quite clear that it was not the intention of the Government to pass it, and that the Government had no intention of adopting the ballot as a definite policy.

After all, what are our objections to the ballot? Firstly, there is the fact—and this has not been recognised by noble Lords this afternoon who have been quoting the Duke of Norfolk's Commission—that that Commission rejected the ballot in no equivocal terms. They rejected it because they said it was unsuited to the conditions of this country; they rejected it because it would press unfairly upon the poorer classes; they rejected it owing to its general unfairness and general unsuitability. We entirely accept and agree with all those contentions. I would add that we do consider that the use of the ballot for the Militia would considerably increase our difficulties in getting voluntary recruits for our Regular Army—difficulties which are quite great enough at the present moment. As the noble Earl, Lord Wemyss, has alluded in his Motion to the debate which took place in 1883, perhaps I may be allowed to read a few lines from the speech delivered on that occasion by the noble Duke the late Duke of Cambridge, who was then Commander-in-Chief. The noble Duke said—

> "The noble Marquess at the head of the War Office and the noble Earl the Under-Secretary of State for War were endeavouring to find the best means of bringing the Line up to its full strength. Until that had been done they could not force recruiting for the Militia, because by so doing they would injure recruiting for the Line."

I venture to think those words from His late Royal Highness will find general agreement in your Lordships' House this evening.

I now come to the last argument which I would bring to your Lordships' notice as to our objection to the ballot. It has been characterised by the noble Earl as fear of the voter. We object to the noble Lord's proposal because we have the strongest evidence—it is stronger now than ever before—that the ballot would be very unpopular in the country. We have the evidence that was given before the Duke of Norfolk's Commission. The question was asked of eighteen witnesses whether they thought that the ballot would be popularly or unpopularly received in this country. Four of the witnesses answered that they thought it would be popular, and fourteen in the negative, and I would remind your Lordships who those witnesses were. First there was the noble Earl himself, who told the Commission about his 400 circulars. I do not think, my Lords, that the 400 individuals the noble Earl wrote to can possibly be fairly claimed as representing the whole of the nation. But still the noble Earl said, and his experience is greater than anybody else's, that wherever he had spoken in favour of the Militia ballot he had heard no word of hostility. I presume he excepted your Lordships' House, because I believed the noble Earl has asked your Lordships on several occasions, without success, to affirm the principle of the ballot. The second witness who said he thought the ballot would not be unpopular was Sir William Nicholson, a great authority, of course, who opined that the trades unions would like it as a help towards the solution of the question of the unemployed. The third witness was Lord Methuen, who said he had not noticed a feeling against the ballot for the Militia; and, lastly there was Colonel Howarth, of Lancashire, who said he thought Lancashire would dislike it at first, but would get to like it in the end. Not very strong testimony perhaps, my Lords, in favour of the popularity of the ballot! The fourteen witnesses who said that they thought the ballot would be very unpopular in the country included Sir Evelyn Wood, Sir W. F. Butler, Sir Henry Hildyard, Mr. R. W. Burbridge (General Manager of Harrod's Stores, Ltd.), Mr. George F. Shee (Secretary of the National Service League), and Colonels of regiments from Inverness, Glasgow, Lancashire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Surrey, two from South Wales, and one from Ireland. That is testimony from all parts of the country, and testimony which, I think, your Lordships will admit is very valuable in this particular. It is because, in addition to the reasons I have given, that I think the Militia ballot would be unpopular in the country, and rightly unpopular because unjust, that I ask your Lordships to vote against the noble Earl's Motion.

*EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I am sure that no one in this House will resent the Motion of my noble friend. We all in this House admire the man who has strong convictions, and who, notwithstanding opposition and defeat, still holds to those convictions and brings them forward as opportunity offers. We admire, I need not say, the vigour and the energy and the eloquence he displays, qualities which in a young man we might be proud of, but which when coming from him we admire all the more. The noble Viscount referred to rumours that were current with regard to what His Majesty's Government intended to do with regard to the Militia. I deprecate altogether fastening any argument on rumours. I do not intend to do so. I feel that this is a matter so grave and so important that a statement must come from the Government itself before we attach any importance to the rumour set about in regard to this matter. I do not blame my noble friend for having referred to it, but I think it right to state what view I hold on such a matter.

The noble Earl who spoke so admirably for the War Office dealt with this question, and I heard from him for the first time that in another place the Prime Minister had announced that the Secretary for War would declare the policy of the Government on this subject next Thursday. I think it right, as here representing the Opposition, to claim for this House the privilege and right and opportunity of expressing also their opinion and of having a statement made to them on this subject. On a matter of finance we know our position. We know we are not able to criticise in detail or to throw out in detail any measure of finance. But this is not a question of finance. No doubt eventually it will effect finance, but it is a principle of great national importance. It covers a great deal of ground. It will lay—I was going to say the foundations, but there have been so many foundations laid and ruthlessly torn up by the Government who have laid them—it will lay down a great policy again; and it is only due to your Lordships' House that you should have an opportunity of hearing from the responsible representative of the Government what the scheme is, and that your Lordships should have an opportunity of expressing an opinion. Therefore, I ask the noble Marquess, the Leader of the House, to respond to this appeal which I make, and to say that he will give this early opportunity.

I now come to a matter exceedingly painful to me, because it concerns a near and dear friend of mine, who has lately achieved a high position at the War Office on the Military Council and who has within the last few days made a speech. I have the highest regard and affection for Sir Neville Lyttelton, and it is painful to me to refer in what must be, I am afraid, a somewhat critical mood to what he has stated. I hope that, if he has made what I fear may be a mistake in dealing with matters as he has done, it is from the novelty of the position he holds and to his not, perhaps, being aware what, as I at least think—and I do not know that the Government will differ from me—is the constitutional position in which he stands as a member of the Army Council. As the leading Military Adviser of the Secretary of State for War, he made a very important speech on this question last Thursday. The noble Earl has referred to it, and he has also referred to certain explanations that have been given. But what do they amount to? The explanations certainly amount to this—that, though the question may not be imminent, the Chief Military Adviser of the Secretary of State has declared opinions which certainly, so far as I know, do not agree with those of His Majesty's Government. No doubt there have been two letters written by him explaining his speech; but I confess I do not think myself that these letters materially alter the situation. He alludes in the first instance to the scheme which His Majesty's Government were about to announce, and, as an old soldier, he says that he looks with doubt upon it and has considerable fear of what may be the result.

I venture to think that this brings before us in a very marked—in a very serious—way the position of the Army Council. I do not know exactly whether the Army Council is based on the model of the Board of Admiralty. In my opinion, every member of the Board of Admiralty, as a member of the Government, is not entitled to make, and does wrong in making, a statement on a question on which he differs from the Government. I am afraid very much that Sir Neville Lyttelton may have exceeded the proper limits by stating that his views differed from those of His Majesty's Government. I have made these remarks with the greatest possible pain, but I hope that Sir Neville Lyttelton's action has arisen from a misconception on his part of his position. I hope we may have some full explanation of Sir Neville Lyttelton's views. I am sure that he is a man of such honour and good sense that he will be ready to understand his position; for I feel it is of the greatest importance with regard to this new branch of administration at the War Office that they and the public should understand exactly how they stand in regard to making independent speeches on such important subjects, and that a member of the Military Council cannot speak, while holding that office, as a private individual. I have made these remarks with every wish to be perfectly fair to my friend and relative, and I feel quite sure that his action arose from the novelty of his position. As I hope we are to have an important debate on the subject of the Army, I shall reserve my opinion on a great many questions which belong to that subject. I hope my noble friend will not divide the House.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Certainly I shall.

EARL SPENCER: Well, if he does it will be my personal duty to vote against him, because I do not think it would be possible for anyone reading the division list not to infer that those who voted with my noble friend were in favour of the ballot or in favour of conscription.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I have heard with great relief the announcement of the noble Earl opposite that he had no intention of pressing us for a premature statement on the Government Army scheme. It would obviously be unfair, both to the authors of the scheme and to your Lordships' House, that it should be disclosed by fragments in the course of a debate like this. But we admit the reasonableness of the noble Earl's demand that your Lordships should be given a full opportunity of considering and discussing the Government scheme, although I do not think I can specify at this moment the precise form in which the opportunity may be given or the particular date at which it may be afforded to the House. I regret that we should have been obliged to postpone to a comparatively late period of the session the disclosure of our views on this important subject; but I do appeal with some confidence to the indulgence of your Lordships, because I think it can scarcely be denied that the task on which the War Office has been engaged is one of the most difficult tasks which has ever fallen to the lot of a public Department.

We are endeavouring to reconstitute one of the most complicated Army systems known to any country. We are endeavouring to do so by the light of recently acquired experience and in view of new principles which have not been sufficiently recognised until very recently. The difficulty is increased by the all-pervading question of expense, which has to be taken into account when we consider the rapid growth of the Army and Navy Estimates during the last few years; and last, but not least, we have endeavoured to do these things amidst the pressure and turmoil of a busy session of Parliament. I hope your Lordships will not think that we have been playing with this subject or trifling with the House because we have not been able to come before you with our proposals at an earlier moment.

The noble Earl devoted a considerable portion of his remarks to a speech delivered by Sir Neville Lyttelton. Let me say at once that, as a question of general principle, I agree with the noble Earl opposite in thinking that speeches on these subjects by military officials, holding high positions, are not desirable, and are, as far as possible, to be avoided; but in this case Sir Neville Lyttelton was placed in a somewhat embarrassing position. He was taking part in one of those festivities in which we all have to take part from time to time. He was called upon unexpectedly to make a speech, and he spoke, I am sure, with the utmost frankness, straight from his heart. But did he really do anything that amounted to or could be represented as throwing over his official chief? He admitted he had misgivings as to the Government scheme; but if you can show me anyone who will put forward a scheme of Army reorganisation and will say that he does so without misgivings, I shall wonder at, but I shall not admire, the confidence of that individual.

*EARL SPENCER: He would not say it.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: If, in those circumstances, Sir Neville Lyttelton's faith in the War Office scheme was the kind of faith which is sometimes represented as connected with honest doubt, I do not think we can greatly blame him. But Sir Neville Lyttelton, so far from saying or suggesting anything to give the idea that he was not at one with the Secretary of State's scheme, has most distinctly intimated that he approves of it, and thinks it the best scheme which can be devised in the circumstances. It is true that he made the reservation that in his opinion a really satisfactory scheme such as, I presume, a soldier and non-politician would approve could not be arrived at without some form of compulsion; but he expressly intimated that he regarded compulsion as being for the time out of the question, and he avoided putting any such proposal forward. I, therefore, do not think that Sir Neville Lyttelton's observations were of a kind that merits animadversion on the part of your Lordships.

There is one other matter as to which I should like to say a word. The noble Earl at the Table and Lord Newton both quoted me as an authority in support of the Militia ballot, and they cited the fact that I had introduced into your Lordships' House a Militia Ballot Bill as conclusive evidence on that point. I feel bound to refresh the otherwise excellent memories of the noble Lords as to the circumstances in which that Bill was laid on the Table of the House. We had had many discussions on the ballot, and I had been constrained by the eloquent arguments of the noble Earl to admit that the machinery of the ballot was in an obsolete and unsatisfactory condition. The ballot, as the noble Earl knew, was, and is, the law of the land, although it is suspended from year to year by special legislation; and I was bound to admit that, so long as the ballot was the law of the land, it was reasonable to ask that the machinery for enforcing it should be in such a condition as to render it reasonably possible that, if we had ever to resort to the ballot, that machinery could be made to work.

I took the advice of my legal advisers on the subject and I introduced the Bill, expressly guarding myself against the suggestion that I was in favour of the ballot; and I think I am right in saying that the noble Earl twitted me not a little on my want of courage in taking that course. I do not think the omens are at this moment propitious for proposals for introducing the ballot. It has received a rude shaking from the Report of the Duke of Norfolk's Commission. At any rate it is out of the question that we should at a moment like this take up a proposal to introduce the ballot. I will not again travel over the ground which the noble Earl who represents the War Office has so fully occupied. I have listened, as we all have, with admiration to the speech of the noble Earl, and I think the debates which he elicits on occasions like this serve a good purpose, for they enable us to consider these matters and to hear the views of noble Lords who are connected with the Militia and take an interest in its affairs. But I am afraid that for all practical purposes the Motion which he has put on the Paper, and which, if it means anything, is a suggestion in favour of the ballot is one which we cannot possibly accept, and if it is pressed to a division we shall have to vote against it.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I merely quoted Sir Neville Lyttelton as showing that he was not happy about the new Government scheme of Army reform. As to the etiquette of his making such a speech, in view of his position on the Defence Committee, I know nothing. But at any rate we know this, that whatever the measure of the Government may be which is to be produced on Thursday next, it does not make the first military authority on the Defence Committee very happy. We have heard from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that the War Office have got a most difficult and complicated task in reconstituting the Army. I have always held that it is the simplest thing in the world if the Government would only do their duty. We are the only nation in the world, civilised or uncivilised, which has a military system which is not enforced by those who are responsible for the safety of the nation. As to the supposed need of producing a measure which would not be unpopular, I have never known the public and the nation refuse that which the responsible officers of the Crown, answerable for the safety of the nation, told them was necessary, no matter whether it was disagreeable to them or not; and on that position I stand. I thank the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition for the kind way in which he spoke about myself.

As to my noble friend Lord Lansdowne being quoted by me as in favour of the ballot, I would explain that it arose from my noble friend having said in this House three years ago that the power of the ballot in a case of emergency was a power with which he would not readily dispense. I then urged that it would not do to wait till an emergency did arise before beginning to deal with an Act which my noble friend had admitted was obsolete. I then pressed him to bring forward a Bill which, as long as the ballot remained the law of the land, would enable it to be put in force, and the result was that my noble friend brought in a Bill, but he put it down, not as a measure to make an obsolete Act operative, but as showing the sort of Bill that the Government would bring in to make the ballot effective when emergency arose. You have not the courage to repeal an Act which you say you cannot enforce because it is unpopular, but you do not make it so that you can enforce it in case of emergency. The position taken up by the Government is an absolutely untenable one. The noble Earl the Under-Secretary quoted Mr. Shee. I have had a correspondence with that gentleman, who wrote to me, objecting to the Militia ballot on the ground that it was invidious. I am still waiting for an answer to my last letter to Mr. Shee, in which I in substance said—

> "You call the ballot a hardship, while I should call it a hardship if, needlessly, the whole country had to go like foreigners into compulsory Militia service, of which the ballot, like decimation, is an alleviation."

I feel so strongly upon this that I shall divide the House as an expression of my own opinion that the Militia ought to be kept up to its full strength and should be so raised that it does not compete with the Regular Army for voluntary recruits. Your Lordships' House is, as regards this Motion, in exactly the same position as it was twenty years ago. Then, as I said in my opening remarks, a Motion was brought forward in the same spirit as the one I have moved to-night. On that occasion both Front Benches were in combination against it. They are also combined against it to-night; but, notwithstanding that, I will still hope there is independence and public spirit enough in your Lordships' House to secure for the Motion substantial support.

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9) Bill; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 11) Bill, Read the third time, and passed.

LONDON PORT AND DOCKS BILL (BY ORDER.)

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD ALWYNE COMPTON (Bedfordshire, Biggleswade) moved that the Order for the Second Reading of the London Port and Docks Bill be discharged and the Bill withdrawn. He said he did so on behalf of the promoters and as a Director of the London and India Docks Company. In 1902 the Government introduced a Bill called the Port of London Bill, which was promoted to purchase the dock companies' undertakings. Since then that Bill had passed through alternate periods of slumber and wakefulness till at last, wearied out, it had fallen asleep altogether. They who represented the trade of the Port of London had always disapproved of the principles on which that Bill was founded, and for that reason they promoted their own private Bill, which they considered carried out better the intentions of the Royal Commission. The President of the Board of Trade constantly told them that the Government Bill was not to be dropped, and for that reason they had postponed, from time to time, their own Bill and gave him all the assistance in their power to pass the Government Bill. They felt they had a grievance in this matter, because they had incurred a great deal of expenditure, on behalf of his company particularly, and also because their Bill, having been postponed so often, had now to be withdrawn. Neither this nor any other Government should interfere directly with trade, as procrastination in this matter had caused a great deal of dislocation of trade.

Order discharged. Bill withdrawn.

That they have agreed to—Great Eastern Railway Bill; North-Western Electricity and Power Gas Bill, with Amendments.

Amendments to—Clyde Valley Electrical Power Bill [Lords], without Amendment.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to continue and amend The Light Railways Act, 1896." [Light Railways Bill [Lords.]

Also, a Bill, intituled, " An Act to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade, under The Tramways Act, 1870, relating to Altrincham Urban District Council Tramways, Calverley Urban District Council Tramways, Crompton Urban District Council Tramways, Plymouth Corporation Tramways, Rochdale Corporation Tramway, Royton Urban District Council Tramways, and Wardle Urban District Council Tramway." [Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 1) Bill [Lords.]

And, also, a Bill, intituled, "An Act to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under The Gas and Waterworks Facilities Act, 1870, relating to Bradfield Water, Cholderton and District Water, Elham Valley Water, Frimley and Farnborough District Water, and North Sunderland Waterworks." [Water Orders Confimation Bill [Lords.]

Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 1) Bill [Lords]. Read the first time; referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, and to be printed. [Bill 265.]

Water Orders Confirmation Bill [Lords] Read the first time; referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, and to be printed. [Bill 266.]

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Civil Service Retirement Regulations.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Minute of 30th July, 1903, as to retirement at the age of sixty-five, is still operative; if so, whether my Lords are still of opinion that in the case of civil servants on smaller salaries every consideration consistent with the efficiency of the service should be shown; and whether the recent application of the Registrar-General of England for an extension in the case of John M. Millner, an abstractor, has been dealt with in accordance with this clause of the Treasury Minute.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) The paragraph referred to was not intended to be of general application, but to meet a limited class of cases of hardship which arose immediately on the passing of the Order in Council of 29th November, 1898, and which are now not likely to recur.

Return of Parish Charities (Scotland).

MR. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he will have the Return of Parish Charities (Scotland), dated 19th April, 1894, brought down to date, and state therein the number of beneficiaries among whom these charities were distributed during the year 1903, and the administrative changes, if any, which have been effected under the first four sub-sections of Section 30 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, since it came into operation.

(Answered by Mr. A. Graham Murray.) I am prepared to grant the Return desired by the hon. Member. The exact form which it should take will require consideration, and when this has been adjusted I shall communicate with him.

Teaching of Hygiene in Scotch Schools.

SIR JOHN LENG (Dundee): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the Scottish Education Department has received a statement from any members of the medical profession, who, in view of the serious physical and moral conditions of degeneracy and disease resulting from the neglect and infraction of the elementary laws of hygiene, desire the Board of Education to consider whether it would be possible to include in the curricula, both of elementary and secondary schools, such teaching as may lead the young to appreciate the value of healthful physical conditions; and whether he will state the intentions of the Department with regard to this representation.

(Answered by Mr. A. Graham Murray.) No representation answering to the description of the hon. Member has been received by the Scotch Education Department. But the subject has been frequently brought before the Department, and is now occupying their attention. I cannot commit the Department to any particular course of action in reply to a Question.

Increase in Number of Aged Poor in Poorhouses in Scotland.

MR. BLACK (Banffshire): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the large increase which has, during the last thirty years, taken place in the proportion of aged poor who are inmates of poorhouses in Scotland as compared with those receiving outdoor relief; whether he has any official information showing that this increase is due to a change of policy, involving aged persons being compelled in greater numbers to go into the poorhouse without the alternative of outdoor relief being offered them; and, if so, will he revert to the former practice of permitting the aged poor to receive relief in their own homes in all cases where they can so arrange.

(Answered by Mr. A. Graham Murray.) I am informed by the Local Government Board that they are not in a position to confirm the statement of the hon. Member in regard to relief of the aged poor. There has been no change of policy on the part of the Board in the direction indicated.

Meal Reliefs in the General Post Office.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that counter clerks stationed at the chief office, London, who commence duty at 6 a.m. and 6.45 a.m. are compelled to take their meal reliefs at 10 a.m. and 10.30 a.m.; that they are prevented by the rules from leaving the building to obtain food, although the official refreshment branch is not open during these hours; and, if so, whether he will inquire into the subject with a view to making an alteration in the meal reliefs.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The arrangement to which the hon. Member refers was made at the request of the men themselves. A few days ago they asked for an alteration, and I find that their wishes have already been met. It would therefore appear that the information supplied to the hon. Member, and on which he based his Question, conveyed an entirely erroneous impression.

Structural Alterations at Roscrea Post Office—Claim of Mr. Acres.

MR. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will explain why payment of £24 claimed by Mr. Acres, late postmaster, Roscrea, county Tipperary, for structural alterations made by him in the post office there, is refused, whilst he was paid £46 for fittings for said post office supplied at the same time; whether he is aware that these structural alterations include the letter receiver and certain woodwork inside the office; that the Department offered Mr. Acres 2s. per month as long as they required the use of the property, and refused to allow Mr. Acres in January, 1903, to remove this property; and whether, seeing that they are still in use in the post office, will payment of Mr. Acres' claim of £24 be made to him.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The office fittings were bought by the Department because they can be removed elsewhere, or disposed of when no longer required where they are. With regard to structural alterations the case is different. The premises, including the letter box, woodwork, and other fixtures referred to, were taken as they now stand by the present postmaster, who refused to allow the removal of the fixtures; and the rent includes interest on the amount expended on structural alterations. The precise amount included in the rent for this purpose is 2s. per month; but I understand that Mr. Acres refused to accept this portion of the rent.

Promotion of a Learner in Portadown Post Office.

MR. WOOD; (Down, E.): To ask the Postmaster-General, whether he is aware that a learner with less than a year's service at Portadown has been given charge of the receipt of mails, and deals exclusively with the registered letter work, whilst clerks of many years service are placed in subordinate positions; and, if so, whether, in view of the official evidence given before the Bradford Commission, he will inquire into the matter.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) I am having inquiry made, and I will communicate the result to the hon. Member.

Teaching of Hygiene in Schools.

SIR JOHN LENG: To ask the Secretary to the Board of Education, whether the Board has received a statement from many members of the medical profession who, in view of the serious physical and moral conditions of degeneracy and disease resulting from the neglect and infraction of the elementary laws of hygiene, desire the Board of Education to consider whether it would be possible to include in the curricula, both of elementary and secondary schools, such teaching as may lead the young to appreciate the value of healthful physical conditions; and whether he will state the intentions of the Board with regard to the representation.

(Answered by Sir William Anson.) The President of the Board received this afternoon a very influential deputation, introduced by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire, who presented a petition signed by over 14,000 members of the medical profession. In reply the President expressed his hearty sympathy with the objects which the deputation had put before him, and detailed the steps which have been, and are being, taken to attain those objects in the training of teachers and other directions.

Status and Pay of Naval School masters.

MR. YOXALL: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if a circular concerning the conditions of recent promotions of naval schoolmasters to be head schoolmasters and head schoolmasters to be chief schoolmasters is to be promulgated; and, if so, when; whether any improvements as to pay, pension, widows' pension, and warrant rank are to be made; and whether it is proposed to improve the status and pay of the naval schoolmasters technically so-called.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) A circular letter to the Fleet on the subject of chief and head schoolmasters has been prepared and will be issued shortly. It will contain full particulars of the new commissioned rank of chief schoolmaster. As regards the existing warrant rank of head schoolmaster the number of officers has been increased, their status raised, and the scale of widows' pensions improved. Instructional allowances also have been attached to certain appointments open to officers of this grade. Full particulars of these changes will be included in the forthcoming circular letter.

Substitution of Schools for Training Ships.

MR. REGINALD LUCAS (Portsmouth): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether it is proposed to discontinue the training of boys for the Royal Navy on board ship at Portsmouth, and substitute training schools ashore elsewhere.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) The "St. Vincent" being still serviceable there is no present intention to discontinue training on board this ship.

Chinese Labour for the Transvaal—Prohibition by the Chinese Authorities at Canton.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will state whether the Chinese authorities in the province of Canton prohibited the further recruitment of labourers for the Transvaal for the reason that the recent Anglo-Chinese Convention was being rendered nugatory through the shipment of labourers from the British port of Hong-kong instead of from a Chinese treaty port, as provided in that Convention; and, if not, what was the reason for this prohibition.

Powers granted for Electric Power Supply to Districts, Return.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Return respecting proceedings under Acts granting powers for the supply of electric power to districts, to which he assented on the 8th February last, may be expected to be in the possession of the House.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) The Return is ready, and will be presented immediately.

Infantile Mortality.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the rate of infantile mortality in many populous districts, he will issue a circular to boards of guardians in the large towns, calling attention to the facts connected with infantile mortality, and pointing out that no difficulty should be made to discourage poor people from applying for early medical aid when they or their children are exposed to danger from epidemic diseases.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) I am advised that the high rate of infantile mortality in large towns is to a considerable extent due to improper feeding, and is by no means confined to children of the pauper class. I am not aware that difficulties are made to discourage poor people, who would be proper recipients of relief, from applying for early medical aid in the circumstances referred to in the Question, but if the hon. Member is aware of cases of the kind, and will furnish me with particulars of them, I shall be happy to make inquiry with regard to them. At present there does not seem to me to be sufficient ground for issuing a circular of the kind suggested.

Position of Debenture Holders of Irish Loan Fund Banks.

DR. THOMPSON (Monaghan, N.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, if his attention has been called to the treatment of the debenture holders of the Irish Loan Fund Banks; is he aware that these depositors were guaranteed against loss by His Majesty's Government, and that notwithstanding they have been paid no interest for years and that their capital cannot now be recovered; that this state of things was produced by the carelessness of a Government Department in Dublin Castle, by the Loan Fund Board of Ireland, and of its Secretary; and if, in view of these circumstances, he is prepared to refund the money thus lost by these debenture holders.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Question is based on an entire misconception of the facts. The Government has never guaranteed depositors in the Loan Fund Banks against loss. It has been frequently pointed out that the Government accepts no responsibility whatever for any losses that may have been incurred by depositors, and that the Executive exercises no control over the proceedings of the Board or the individual societies working in connection with that Board. The reply to the Question is consequently in the negative. The Bill now before the House is intended to facilitate the collection of money due to the societies, and should it become law the position of debenture holders of insolvent societies will be materially improved.

The Irish Estates Commissioners.

DR. THOMPSON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the amount of work in the office of the Estates Commissioners, and that, notwithstanding, the Commissioners have issued directions to their inspectors that in estimating the value of non-judicial rents they are to carefully inspect and tabulate in detail the different farms, noting all the improvements; and, if so, whether he will consider the desirability of allowing an inspector to inspect the estate as a whole and furnish his report without entering so much into minute particulars.

Irish Poor Law Medical Officers' Superannuation Bill.

DR. THOMPSON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Irish Poor Law Medical Officers' Superannuation Bill has the support of nearly the whole body of Irish Members; and, if so, considering the importance of this Bill, he will consent to make it a Government measure and pass it into law this session.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) No, sir; I am not aware that the fact is as stated. I have more than once expressed the opinion that I should be glad to see a Bill become law that was designed to effect a settlement of the question of superannuation upon a basis fair and equitable and acceptable to all parties proposed to be affected. But the Bill before the House would not attain these objects. In my correspondence with the Poor Law Association I suggested the reconstruction of the measure upon a basis that would stand the test of actuarial criticism. Until this has been done the Government cannot consider the question of providing facilities for the passage of the Bill.

Erection of Labourer's Cottage for William Carroll in the Cashel Rural District.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a labourer named William Carroll applied to the Cashel Rural District Council for a labourer's cottage and plot; that his representation was passed by the council and also passed at the inquiry held by the Local Government inspector; that no opposition was offered at the inquiry; that an arbitrator was appointed and his award made; that when all this had been done an objection was made by a Mr. Hemphill on the ground that he was not served with the statutory notice; and whether, seeing that no steps have since been taken to build the cottage, and in view of the size of the hut in which this man and his family are living, the Local Government Board will take steps to have the cottage erected.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The facts are as stated. The Local Government Board is not, however, empowered to take steps to have the cottage erected in view of mistake made by the district council in the service of the requisite notices on the persons interested in the plot. It is a matter for the council to consider whether it might not be able to come to terms with the owner and occupier for the taking of the site, or of an alternative site on their lands.

The Sherlock Estate, County Cork.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork County, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the tenants on the Sherlock Estate, Ballyrobin, Cloyne, county Cork, which is at present in the Land Judge's Court, will be afforded an opportunity of purchasing their holdings.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) It is necessary to communicate with the solicitor having carriage of the proceedings for the sale of this estate, and I would ask the hon. Member to postpone the Question till Thursday next.

Manufacture of Rifles in Government and Private Factories.

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe): To ask the Secretary of State for War what number of the service rifles, Lee-Metford and Lee-Enfield, were made at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, during the years 1889–1890, 1890–1891, 1891–2, 1892–3, 1893–4; what was the cost per rifle each year; what number of Lee-Metford and Lee-Enfield rifles were made at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Birmingham, during the same period, and what was the cost per rifle for each year; what was the number of these rifles made at the London Small Arms Factory, Old Ford, during the same period, and what was the cost per rifle each year respectively; and will he state if the cost of establishment, depreciation of plant and machinery, are included in the cost of the rifle at Enfield, whether wages at Enfield are higher than at any other small arms factory, and whether a large amount of sub-contracting exists at the present time at the private firms, resulting in the employment of a number of men by sub-contractors at low wages.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) The number of service rifles made at Enfield and Birmingham for the years in question, and their cost, were as follows:—

	Enfield Lock.		Birmingham.
	Number.	Price.	Number.	Price.
1889–90 - - -	31,238	5 5 0½	4,395	5 18 4
1890–91 - - -	92,127	3 11 10¼	26,957	3 14 5
1892–3 - - -	35,240	3 14 6½	13,633	3 17 4¼
1893–4 - - -	32,945	3 10 4	15,870	3 14 9

The number made by the London Small Arms Company in the same period was 75,000, and the price per rifle for the first half of the contract was £5 10s., and for the second half £4 18s. The cost of establishment and depreciation of plant and machinery are included in the cost of the rifle at Enfield. As regards wages at Enfield, when the difference of rates of wages in different districts and of the scheme of manufacturing in each factory are taken into consideration, the run of wages for rifle work is not higher than at Sparkbrook, but, if anything, it may be said to be rather lower. The rate of wages paid by private firms is not known. There is no sub-contracting at the present time of which the War Department is aware.

Officers warned for Removal from Salisbury.

SIR WALTER PALMER (Salisbury): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether any officer or any member of the staff attached to or belonging to the division at Salisbury has received official notice to be ready to leave Salisbury this year; and, if so, whether such notice is definite, or merely precautionary.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) Notice of prospective removal, to take place on the 30th September, was given; but, as it appeared probable that inconvenience and expense might be caused by the shortness of the notice, the move has been postponed until the 31st December.

Promotion in the Royal Army Medical Corps.

DR. THOMPSON: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware of the dissatisfaction existing amongst the officers of the Royal Army Medical Corps at the recent promotions, whereby twelve senior officers were passed over in favour of a younger officer of less distinguished service than some of those whose claims were rejected; and if, in future, he will direct the Advisory Board to give their reasons for their selections and communicate them if requested to the officers passed over.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) The Secretary of State is not aware of the dissatisfaction amongst the officers of the Royal Army Medical Corps alleged in the Question. Promotions are made by selection and after careful inquiry by the Advisory and Selection Boards. The standard upon which the Advisory Board bases its recommendations is that of positive merit, and suitability for the Administrative Medical Staff of the Army. It would not appear desirable that reasons for supersession should be communicated to the officers affected.

Tenders for Meat for Ballykinlor Camp.

MR. WOOD: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that tenders were asked for the supply of butcher's meat for the camp at Ballykinlor from the 1st June to the 1st December, 1904, he will say who were the parties who tendered for same, and the prices at which they tendered, and explain why the lowest tender was not accepted.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) The General Officer Commanding the 9th Division sent out the tenders referred to and is authorised to accept or decline all such tenders.

Disturbances amongst Chinese Labourers at Tientsin.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can now give an account of a conflict in Tientsin between two batches of Chinese indentured labourers awaiting embarkation for the Transvaal mines, under the provisions of the Chinese Labour Ordinance, the casualties already reported being three Chinamen killed and twenty wounded; and whether, having regard to the fact that the combatants at Tientsin were natives of North China and South China between whom a deadly feud exists, any provision has been made to prevent similar collisions during the voyage to South Africa and in the mines; if he has received a telegraphic report of this occurrence, why has he not communicated that report to the House of Commons; if he has not received such report, what steps does he intend to take with reference to the delay.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) I received a telegram from the Transvaal Government Agent at Tientsin on 22nd June, stating that the deaths occurred as a result of a street brawl on a large scale which originated between two bodies of Chinese emigrants living in different quarters of the town, and that there was no reason to apprehend that there will be trouble on the ships; that the contending parties would be carried on different ships; and that a despatch will follow by mail. I expected the hon. Member by repeating his Question as he has now done to enable me to give the information to the House.

Salaries and Fees of Law Officers of the Crown—Opportunity for Discussion.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether in view of the fact that no discussion was permitted in the session of 1903 on the salaries and fees of the Law Officers of the Crown, and having regard to the fact that the amendment to the law regarding the publication of false balance-sheets promised by the Prime Minister on the 19th February, 1903, is indefinitely postponed, he will undertake that full opportunity will be given during the present session of Parliament for discussing the salaries and fees paid to the Law Officers of the Crown amounting to £32,990 7s.

(Answered by Mr. A. J. Balfour.) In view of important Estimates which have not yet been before the Committee of Supply, I can give no pledge to put down the Vote mentioned by the hon. Member. I may remind him that the False Statements (Companies) Bill was introduced in the House of Commons on 25th February of this year in pursuance of the undertaking given by the Government. It is, however, evident from the Notices on the Paper that the Bill cannot be regarded as uncontroversial.

H.M.S. "Centurion"—Defective Gun Sights.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, can he state what is the prize-firing record last received of H.M.S. "Centurion," and whether the Board of Admiralty consider it to be satisfactory; have the Admiralty received any report from Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge, as Commander-in-Chief on the China Station, to the effect that H.M.S. "Centurion" was unfit to go into action by reason of her defective gun sights; and can he say what steps have since been taken to remedy the defects, and when the Admiralty expect that H.M.S. "Centurion" will be fit to go into action.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. PRETYMAN, Suffolk, Woodbridge): The prize-firing records are confidential; but it may be stated that the "Centurion's" firing was not as good as on a former occasion referred to in my reply to the hon. Member for Caithness on 18th April.† That reply covers all the points raised in this Question.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The latter part of my Question is not covered by that Answer.

MR. PRETYMAN: The Admiralty do not admit that the "Centurion" is not fit to go into action.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Have any steps been taken to remedy the defects?

MR. PRETYMAN: It was stated on a former occasion that improvements and alterations are constantly being made in the sighting and fittings, and when a ship is on a foreign station it is impossible to say at a given moment whether her sights have been altered.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Is the "Centurion" fit to go into action?

MR. PRETYMAN: Yes, Sir.

H.M.S. "Prince of Wales"—Sight Fittings.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, in view of the fact that the sight fittings of H.M.S. "Prince of Wales" are not what would be supplied now, will he state what sight fittings would be supplied now; and has any decision been arrived at as regards the best form of sights and sight fittings either for turret guns or for 6 inch guns.

† See (4) Debates, cxxxiii., 359.

MR. PRETYMAN: The details asked for in the first part of the Question cannot be given in reply to a Parliamentary Question. A decision has been arrived at as to what is at present regarded as the best form of sights for turrets and 6-inch guns, but there is no such thing as finality in this matter.

Alteration on Ships of War—King's Regulations.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty are the ship's artificers of H.M.S. "Prince of Wales" engaged in fitting cross connections to the ship's 6-inch gun sights and in fitting large range discs; and, in view of Art. 1319 of the King's Regulations, prescribing that proposals for alterations and additions shall be made by letter, were any such proposals made by letter before the alterations were carried out.

MR. PRETYMAN: They may be doing so; inquiry can be made if desired. Article 1319 of the King's Regulations does not refer to such alterations as these, but to large alterations that are proposed to be made by a dockyard, and consequently require special approval.

In reply to a further Question, MR. PRETYMAN said the commanders of ships were encouraged to carry out these smaller alterations themselves, and a letter was not necessary in such a case as this.

Transvaal Labour Ordinance.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will cable to Lord Milner and ascertain whether the Law Officers of the Transvaal Government construe the Chinese Ordinance as permitting Chinese labourers to do mining work formerly performed by white miners; also, if Chinese labourers are to-day employed at the Comet Mine as overseers, and if they are under the direction and supervision of white gangers; and, if so, are these Chinese overseers additional and supplemental hands to the staff of the mines, seeing that Kaffir overseers or gangers have never been employed in the Transvaal mines except under white miners.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): It does not seem to me to be desirable or necessary to telegraph as proposed by the hon. Member. The terms of the Ordinance appear to me to be plain in confining these labourers to unskilled labour, which is defined as that usually performed in the mines by natives. I am not informed as to the exact arrangements which have been made in the Comet Mine, but I will inquire.

The Chinese Exclusion Bill in Cape Colony.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the assent of the Crown, withheld from the Chinese Exclusion Bill by the Governor of Cape Colony for the consideration of the Colonial Office, has yet been given; and to what is the delay in giving that assent due, if it has not yet been given, having regard to the presence in this country of the Governor of Cape Colony,

MR. LYTTELTON: No, Sir; there is nothing unusual in the delay It is usual to sanction reserved Bills by Order in Council, and, as I informed the hon. Member a week ago, the authenticated copy of the law only reached me on the 2nd instant.

Desertions from the Coolie Camp in Johannesburg.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information showing that two colonial coolies imported to the Rand under the Chinese Labour Ordinance have deserted from the New Comet Mine, Johannesburg, and were captured on Wednesday last at Pretoria, having tramped thither from Johannesburg; can he say whether they were escorted to Johannesburg by military or by police, and were they handcuffed; what was the reason for their desertion, and what will be the punishment accorded to them; and whether there is any explanation of the circumstance that they have, within a few days of entrance on their work as indentured labourers, thus deserted from it.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I have no information on the subject.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman use the cable? Is he aware that there is a telegraph to South Africa?

Mr. LYTTELTON: Yes, Sir, I am quite aware that there is a telegraph, but I do not consider it necessary to employ it.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: I also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has sent a despatch by the last mail to Lord Milner calling his attention to the fact that these two coolies had escaped from this mine, and inquiring how they escaped and how they were brought back?

Mr. LYTTELTON said he had not written to Lord Milner.

*Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware it is reported that a large number of Chinese coolies have escaped?

Mr. SPEAKER: A Question must not be based on reports.

Great Britain and Tibet—Chinese Rights.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what is our precise position towards China in regard to Tibet; is Tibet an independent kingdom or is it a portion of the Chinese Empire; has the representative of China in Tibet full powers from his Government to enter into a treaty with us; and, if so, would this treaty be valid before being ratified by the Chinese Government in Pekin; or have we—assuming Tibet to be a dependency of China—obtained any assurance from the Chinese authorities that if we sign a treaty with Tibet such treaty would be binding on China.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): For information regarding the status of Tibet I must refer the hon. Member to the Blue-book. The negotiations will be conducted jointly with the Chinese Amban and the Tibetan representatives. The Chinese Government has been kept duly apprised of the action of His Majesty's Government in Tibet, and the Chinese Amban at Lhasa expressed to Colonel Younghusband, on his arrival at Gyangtse, his readiness to negotiate.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Are we at war with China or not?

Mr. BRODRICK: I think that Question has been repeatedly answered. It does not arise on this Question so far as I can gather.

Assistant Military Secretary for Indian Affairs.

Captain NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state when the appointment of Assistant Military Secretary for Indian Affairs is likely to be filled up.

Mr. BRODRICK: The appointment in question has been abolished.

Regent of Zanzibar.

Mr. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, seeing that a deputation from Zanzibar recently came to England to complain of the proceedings of the Regent, he will state if the Regent is now at Zanzibar or on leave of absence; and, if not, will he say with whom has the Government been in correspondence regarding the matters complained of by the Envoy.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl Percy, Kensington, S.): The Regent is at Zanzibar. I have already stated that His Majesty's Government has been in communication with the Sultan and with the Regent.

Stoppage of British Mail Steamers by Russian Warships.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any inquiry has been made as to the circumstances under which a British mail steamer was recently stopped in the Red Sea by a Russian man-of-war; whether the man-of-war issued from and returned to neutral ports; whether there is reason to believe that she had coaled in a neutral port since having coaled in a Russian port; and whether any protest has been made either to any neutral Power or to the Russian Government on the subject.

EARL PERCY: His Majesty's Government have received no information of the stoppage of any British mail steamer recently in the Red Sea. In February last two steamers of the Peninsular and Oriental Company and one of the Indian Steam Navigation Company were stopped by the Russian squadron in the Red Sea, and in two cases the vessel was boarded and its papers examined, but in each case after a very short detention it was allowed to proceed. There was nothing in these cases which would have justified any protest on the part of His Majesty's Government.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, have the Board of Trade issued a notice or warning to merchant ships to the effect that when meeting vessels of His Majesty's Fleet they should keep out of the way of such vessels; if so, will he state its date and terms; does the notice practically suspend and supersede on such an occasion the ordinary rule of the road at sea as between ship and ship; does it apply to foreign as well as to British merchant ships; and do the Board of Trade propose to adhere to or withdraw such notice.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): (1) In April, 1897, the Board of Trade issued a notice to shipowners and masters calling attention to the danger to all concerned which is caused by single vessels approaching a squadron of warships so closely as to involve risk of collision, or attempting to pass ahead of, or through, or to break the line of, such squadrons. Mariners were warned that on such occasions it would be in the interests of safety for single ships to adopt timely measures to keep out of the way of, and avoid passing through, a squadron. This notice was re-issued in July, 1900, with reference to the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal in the "Sanspareil" case. (2) The notice is advisory only and does not suspend or supersede the rule of the road at sea. (3) It was not addressed to owners or masters of foreign ships; and (4) as at present advised I am not prepared to withdraw it.

Stony Stratford Postmastership—War Services Rewarded.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will explain why a candidate was appointed to the postmastership of Stony Stratford who had only eighteen years service, seeing that other candidates applied with considerably over twenty years approved service; and whether, in view of the weekly notice in the Post Office Circular that outside influence should not be employed in seeking appointments, he will state whether any recommendations other than official were considered in this case, and what steps he proposes to take.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Lord STANLEY, Lancashire, Westhoughton): The postmaster was appointed by me because I considered him the most suitable of the candidates. He was not only strongly recommended by his official superiors, but he had also rendered special service in South Africa during the War. He was mentioned in despatches for continuous and marked good service, and his name was officially brought to the Postmaster-General's notice in 1902 by Lord Kitchener's orders. No outside or unofficial recommendations were brought before me or considered.

MR. NANNETTI inquired if it were not against the rules for civil servants to receive testimonials from distinguished individuals outside.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Home

Department what is the cause of the unusual delay in the publication of the Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. COCHRANE, Ayrshire, N.): I explained, in answer to a Question of the right hon. Baronet on the same subject last March,† the special circumstances which made it impossble to promise this year's Report at so early a date as last year's. Every effort, however, has been made to expedite the printing of the Report, and I understand that copies will be delivered on Friday next.

Alien Pauper Lunatics and Convicts.

SIR WALTER GREENE (Bury St. Edmunds): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state how many pauper alien lunatics are known to be at present maintained at public expense within the Metropolitan area, and whether there has been any, and what, increase in the number of such persons during the last five years; and whether he can state how many alien convicts are at the present time confined in convict prisons, and whether he can state the number of aliens who were during the year 1903 confined in local prisons.

MR. COCHRANE: Inquiry is being made as regards the pauper alien lunatics, and if the information desired can be obtained it will be communicated to the hon. Member. The number of aliens in convict prisons on 23rd April, 1904, was 182. The number confined in local prisons on conviction during the year ended 31st March, 1903, was, 3,449. These are the latest dates for which information is available; and it is impossible to obtain fresh statistics without an examination of the prison records, which would involve considerable time and labour.

Agricultural Profits in Great Britain.

MR. EUGENE WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): I beg to ask the hon. Member for North Huntingdonshire, as representing the Board of Agriculture, whether he can state approximately the annual profit made by proprietors farming their own land, tenant farmers, and holders of allotments in Great Britain during the year ending 31st March last.

MR. AILWYN FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey): I regret that we are not in possession of information which would enable the Board even approximately to estimate the annual profit made by the various classes of occupiers of agricultural land to which the hon. Member refers.

Ordnance Survey Department Discipline.

MR. NANNETTI: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that a temporary civil assistant in the Ordnance Survey Department has been reduced by the sum of 3d. per day by the divisional officer for visiting, without permission, his wife, who was dangerously ill; and whether, under the circumstances, he will take the case into his consideration, and restore to this man his position and pay.

MR. AILWYN FELLOWES: Inquiries into the case mentioned have been instituted, but the information necessary to enable me to reply to the Question is not yet available. Perhaps the hon. Member would put it down again in a day or two's time.

Admiralry Courtyard, Whitehall.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Chorley, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether his attention has been called to the wooden or plaster shutters which have been placed behind the open work of the architectural screen which connects the gateway leading into the Admiralty Courtyard, Whitehall; and whether he could propose to the First Commissioner of Works to remove these shutters and allow the whole screen to be seen and appreciated.

LORD BALCARRES: (Lancashire, Chorley): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. It appears that the wooden shutters referred to have been in existence for many years. The First Commissioner is considering the possibility of removing them.

Rathmines Register.

MR. MOONEY (Dublin County, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland if he has now received the police report relative to the tampering with the requisition forms in the Rathmines polling district of South Dublin; and what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): The police have not as yet been able to establish the identity of the persons who collected and tampered with these forms, but they are pursuing their inquiries. I am informed that the town clerk has already taken steps to counteract the attempt to falsify the register, and that the correct names of the voters will be inserted in the lists.

Kingstown and Dalkey Voters Lists.

MR. MOONEY: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland if his attention has been called to complaints from the Kingstown and Dalkey polling districts of South Dublin as to the tampering with the voters' requisition forms by the agents of a certain organisation; and whether, if a list of these agents, together with a list of such forms altered by them without authority, is placed before him, he will direct a prosecution to take place; and whether he proposes to take any, and, if so, what action to secure that these inaccuracies should be corrected, and the persons entitled, and these only, placed on the supplemental list.

MR. ATKINSON: My attention has been called to the matter. The town clerks of Kingstown and Dalkey state that no complaints have been made to them on the subject, and the latter gentleman further states that he is certain that no forms were tampered with in his district. I shall be thankful, however, to the hon. Member for any information he may be good enough to furnish me with, calculated to aid the police in the inquiries they are now making on the subject.

Transfer of Powers from Irish Harbour Authorities to County Councils.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will introduce a short Bill this session giving the Irish Local Government Board power, by Provisional Order, to transfer to a county council any of the powers, duties, and liabilities of any harbour commissioners or trustees (except the commissioners of Royal harbours) in cases where such a transfer is agreed to both by the county council and by the trustees or Commissioners.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): I stated on the 1st inst. that further legislation is unnecessary.† In the case of Courtown Harbour, to which I understand the Question is intended to refer, I am informed that, inasmuch as it is administered by a public body, the transfer of its powers to the county council can be effected by Provisional Order under the 20th Section of the Act of 1898. The Local Government Board would be prepared to make a Provisional Order forthwith and without local inquiry upon receiving a formal resolution to that effect from the county council and the written consent of the harbour trustees to the proposed transfer.

Fisheries on South-East Coast of Ireland.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is in a position to state the result of his inquiries into the condition of the fishing industry on the south-east coast of Ireland, and what he proposes to do for the assistance of that industry.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Question has reference to the application of Section 11 of the Marine Works Act to the maintenance of fishery piers in non-congested districts. The matter is still engaging consideration, and I am not yet in a position to make any statement in respect to it.

Dr. Starkie and Irish Intermediate Schools.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the

Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if Dr. Starkie, the Resident Commissioner of National Education in Ireland, was authorised to accompany Messrs. Dale and Stevens on their visits to Irish intermediate schools.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Dr. Starkie is one of the Commissioners of Intermediate Education. He accompanied Messrs. Dale and Stevens at their request.

Derrygoolan Shooting Rights.

Mr. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Galway, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state at whose request the police accompanied strangers on the lands of Derrygoolan in 1902 and 1903 when these strangers were attempting to shoot over the tenants' farms, held from year to year for a great number of years; and if these tenants requisition the services of the police on the 12th August next to assist them in preventing persons shooting their game without permission their request will be complied with, and a sufficient police force be supplied to prevent a breach of the law.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The police, so far as I am aware, received no request and no orders to attend. They had reason to apprehend a breach of the peace and attended to prevent serious violence. It is their duty to prevent violence; but not to prejudice the case of either of the parties claiming the same right. Such claims can only be determined by process of law, that is by one or other of the parties suing either for trespass or for technical assault.

Mr. KILBRIDE: The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that in the case of a tenant from year to year he has as much right to the game as any landlord in this House has to the game on his estate.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The whole thing depends on the nature of the occupation, and that can only be determined in a Court of Law.

Mr. KILBRIDE: Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that they are tenants from year to year?

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): How was it the police attended without a request.

Mr. WYNDHAM: They apprehended that there was going to be a row.

Moy Nationalist Demonstration,

Mr. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether facilities will be given to contingents attending the Nationalist demonstration at Moy, county Tyrone, on 15th August to proceed by the road leading from Trew and Moy Station.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am informed by the authorities locally responsible that a Nationalist procession through the district in question, which is almost exclusively Orange, would be calculated to endanger the preservation of the peace and would, in all probability, lead to rioting and serious disturbance. Such processions have always hitherto proceeded by the route from Dungannon and Annaghmore, and the Government is unable to entertain any arrangement which contemplates a departure from the route which has been safely followed in former years.

Mr. MACVEAGH: How did the local authorities arrive at the conclusion that this is an Orange district in view of the fact that there are only two Orangemen in the whole neighbourhood. Why is not the procession to be allowed to take this route?

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! That Question has been answered.

Irish Land Purchase—Granville Knox Estate, County Mayo.

Mr. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received from the Ballina District Council a memorial signed by the tenantry of the Granville H. Knox Estate, Crossmolina, county Mayo, which is announced to be sold by public auction in Ballina, on the 13th inst., by order of Judge Ross; and, if so, will he state the circumstances of this sale, and say whether, as this estate contains waste land suitable for the enlargement of small holdings, steps will be taken to give effect to the prayer of memorialists by having this untenanted land purchased for the purpose of enlarging the uneconomic holdings on the untenanted portions proposed to be sold.

MR. WYNDHAM: The sale by auction has been adjourned by the Land Judge to enable the Estates Commissioners to determine whether they will make an offer for the lands.

Labourers Acts—Cost of Providing Additional Land.

MR. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will cause inquiries to be made of all the clerks of rural district councils in whose districts additional half-acres have been already provided under the Labourers Acts, so as to obtain from each rural district an estimate of the average cost of providing an additional half acre, specifying price of land, cost of fencing, legal expenses, and general expenses.

MR. WYNDHAM: An effort will be made to procure this information. But it will, I understand, be very troublesome to collect and will impose much additional labour upon clerks of rural district councils.

Evicted Tenants in County Galway.

MR. KILBRIDE: On behalf of the hon. Member for East Galway, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of evicted tenants in the county of Galway who have applied to the Estates Commissioners for reinstatement; how many have been restored; and what has been done either to reinstate the remainder or put them into new holdings.

MR. WYNDHAM: 281 applications have been received. Forty-one have been referred to inspectors to report on. None have as yet been reinstated.

MR. KILBRIDE: Have any untenanted lands been purchased in county Galway?

MR. WYNDHAM: I should like to have notice of that Question, if it is desired to press it; but I may say I have little to add to the statement I made on this subject last Friday.†

Warren's Court Estate, County Cork.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the offer for sale of the Warren's Court Estate, at Kilmurray, county Cork, under the Land Act of 1903, he will state the terms asked by the landlord, and whether they have been agreed to by the tenants; have any representations been received by the Estates Commissioners from Denis Murphy, an evicted tenant; and, if so, whether, seeing that the present occupant of the evicted holding, a man named Kingston, has expressed his willingness to leave it on payment of a fair compensation, the Estates Commissioners will use their good offices towards the reinstatement of the evicted tenant, seeing that both the landlord and his agent are willing to agree to it provided the present occupant can be got to leave.

MR. WYNDHAM: No application has been made to the Estates Commissioners in the case of the Warren Estate. An application for reinstatement has been received from Denis Murphy.

Salters' Company's Trust in Magherafelt.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in 1899 the Salters' Company, of London, conveyed to certain trustees in Magherafelt, county Derry, the old Courthouse and bridewell, the markets, and certain other property, to hold in trust for the town of Magherafelt upon certain conditions; and that, apart from an annual payment of £120 to two local schools and the handing over £100 to the Magherafelt Gas Company, no other disbursements have been made by the trustees; and whether, in view of the desire of the inhabitants that the money in the hands of the trustees should be spent for the benefit and improvement of the town, a local inquiry will be ordered in order to ascertain the conditions under which the trust was made over, its present value, and the best means of securing that it shall be administered for the benefit and according to the wish of the people of Magherafelt.

Mr. WYNDHAM: As far as I have been able to ascertain, the Salters' Company assigned certain property to trustees to be used for certain purposes. This trust has been faithfully carried out. I have no power whatever to institute such an inquiry as suggested, or to compel owners of property to dedicate it to purposes other than those to which they desire to devote it.

Wicklow Canteen Licence—Action of Mr. Shanks.

Mr. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has considered the action of Mr. James Shanks in signing a licence certificate for a canteen situated in the county Wicklow, Mr. Shanks not being a magistrate for that county, and the local magistrates having refused to grant the licence on the ground that the canteen had been conducted in a disorderly manner; and whether he can now state what decision the Lord Chancellor has come to in regard to Mr. Shanks' action.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am in communication with the Lord Chancellor in this matter, and will ask the hon. Member to repeat the Question on Wednesday.

Proselytising Practices in Kinsale—Complaint against Commander Salwey.

Mr. CREAN (Cork County, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that E. Salwey, Commander R.N., Divisional Office, Kinsale, who lately distributed tracts at the Cork Post Office, is constantly engaged in this and other proselytising practices in the town and district of Kinsale; and, in view of the fact that the annual training of the Naval Reserve, mainly composed of Catholic fishermen and sailors, is under his command, he will have him immediately removed from the district.

Mr. PRETYMAN: This matter has already engaged the attention of the Rear-Admiral Commanding at Queenstown, and the Board of Admiralty are awaiting his report.

Phœnix Park, Dublin—Traders' Vans.

Mr. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the action of the Board of Works in Ireland in refusing traders permission to send their vans through the Phœnix Park, Dublin, for the purpose of delivering goods to customers within the Park; whether he is aware that within the last few weeks a trader named Mr. Henry Baggot has been refused such permission, although he furnished, in reply to a demand from the Board, the names of the customers within the ambit of the Park whom he habitually supplied with goods; and, if so, will he say what was the reason for so treating him; and who is responsible for the regulations in virtue of which such restraints are put on trade and business.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY of the TREASURY (Mr. Victor Cavendish, Derbyshire, W.): Yes, Sir. I am aware of the circumstances. It is necessary in order to preserve the amenity of the Phœnix Park as a place of public enjoyment to restrict its use by carts, vans, and business vehicles as far as possible. But passes are granted to tradesmen and others who can show that their business requires it. The Board of Works are satisfied that the business of Mr. Baggot in the Park is not of such a character as to justify the grant of a pass.

Mr. CLANCY: Are we to understand that the right of a driver to go through the Park depends on the Board of Works being satisfied as to the number of his customers?

Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH: Yes, Sir. The Board of Works have to take that into consideration.

Harcourt Road, Dublin—Sub-Postmaster's Salary

Mr. NANNETTI: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General why the increase of salary which accrued to the town sub-postmaster of Harcourt Road, Dublin, in May, 1902, was withheld.

LORD STANLEY: I find that in 1902, owing to the salary of the Harcourt Street Post Office having been inadvertently entered on a return relating to the Harcourt Road Office, an increase of £4 4s. a year then due for salary at the latter was unfortunately withheld. I have given instructions for the matter to be at once adjusted.

The Cut, Mountmellick, Queen's County.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the road known as the Cut, near Clonaslee, Mountmellick, Queen's county has, by order of the military authorities, been closed, thereby causing loss to the residents in the removal of peat fuel from the adjoining bogs; and, if so, will he say whether, before this step was taken, the provisions of the Military Lands Act, 1892, were complied with, and will he give the particulars of what was done, the notices served, the reports received, the persons from whom they were received; and whether steps will be taken to ensure that these people shall not be inconvenienced in securing fuel at the only season in which it is possible for them to do so.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BROMLEY DAVENPORT, Cheshire, Macclesfield): The road in question is not closed. It was closed for five days while firing took place in the vicinity. No complaints were received, but as soon as it became known that traffic might be interfered with, the road was re-opened and arrangements were made by which firing could take place without interfering with the road. It is regretted that through an error the provisions of the Military Lands Act were not complied with.

Longford Infirmary Committee and Military Patients.

SIR CARNE RASCH (Essex, Chelmsford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the action of the Longford Infirmary Committee at their last quarterly meeting, when the officer commanding, having requested that emergency cases should be treated there owing to the military hospital being closed, was refused, on the ground that the cases might be those of Englishmen, and also that no decent farmer could be in the same ward with a soldier; and, if so, what provision has been made for such cases of accident and emergency as may occur among the troops there quartered.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: The attention of the Secretary of State was first drawn to the matter by this Question. As the military hospital at Longford is fully equipped with a civil practitioner in charge, no question arises as regards the adequate treatment of any emergency or other cases. The alleged gratuitous insult to the British soldier by the Longford Infirmary Committee would hardly, therefore, appear to deserve further consideration.

The State and the Unemployed.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will make a statement before the recess, to the House, as to what action he proposes to take, if any, with regard to advising the various Departments of the State during the recess to deal efficiently with the unemployed, which are an increasing number in the United Kingdom.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Before my right hon. friend answers this Question, may I ask him if he has considered the influence on the state of affairs indicated in the Question of the hon. Member for Woolwich, as to the increasing number of unemployed in the United Kingdom, of free competing imports without reciprocity, and the unrestricted immigration of destitute aliens?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Without travelling over the wide field suggested by my hon. and gallant friend, I may say, in answer to the hon. Gentleman opposite, that this question is constantly under the consideration of the Local Government Board, and the hon. Member may be quite sure that there will be no neglect of it on the part of His Majesty's Government.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that thousands of white men now unemployed in London would be prepared to go to work in the Transvaal mines if they were guaranteed 10s. a day?

Thames Barrage Scheme and National Foreshore Reclamation.

MR. CROOKS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will appoint a Departmental Committee to consider the practicability of the Thames barrage scheme, and also the advisability of formulating a scheme of national foreshore reclamation, with a view of providing useful work for the unemployed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The two proposals referred to in this Question do not appear to be very closely allied, and in any case I am advised that neither scheme seems at present to present features which would justify the appointment of a Departmental Committee.

MR. CROOKS: Then we are not even to have an inquiry whether they would or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman will admit that there must be a strong prima facie case for putting the officials of a Department to the labour of such an inquiry, and I rather gather that that prima facie case has not been made out.

The Coaling of Belligerent Warships at English Coaling Stations.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, have His Majesty's Government considered the conditions that should be attached to granting permission, during war, to belligerent men-of-war for coaling in coaling stations of His Majesty's dominions within or beyond the seas; and have they especially considered the necessity for requiring, as a condition precedent to granting such permission, a satisfactory engagement that any belligerent man-of-war allowed to be supplied with sufficient coal to carry her to the nearest port of her own nation will in fact proceed to that port direct, and will not use the coal supplied for proceeding elsewhere, in order to carry on operations of war against the other belligerent.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question has engaged the attention of the Government, and directions have been given for carrying out the condition to which my hon. friend refers in the last lines of his Question.

The Licensing Bill.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will state what provisions the Government propose to insert in the Licensing Bill providing that adequate penalties shall be imposed on those publicans who do not provide reasonable refreshment for the public, and also for those who do not comply with the reasonable requirements of the magistrates.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman will look at the Amendments on the Paper he will see that both his points are met by those standing in the name of the Solicitor-General.

The Aliens Bill.

MR. FORDE RIDLEY (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been called to the Report of the Standing Committee on the Aliens Bill, and to the decision of the Committee that it is useless, in view of the large number of Amendments put down against the Bill, to proceed further with its consideration during the present session; and if he will undertake to reintroduce it early next session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: From what I can hear of the proceedings in Committee upon this Bill, it received treatment which would make it absolutely impossible to carry it into law during the course of the present session. I understand that the average rate of progress was two lines in a day. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Three lines in six days."] I beg pardon: three lines in six days, or half a line a day. I have not made the arithmetical calculation as to the length of time it would have taken in Grand Committee had the same rate of progress been maintained on all the clauses of the Bill; but I think it will be obvious that the Committee had absolutely no choice, in the face of the treatment which the Bill received, but to take the course they actually did take. My hon. friend asks me for a pledge that the Government will reintroduce the Bill early next session. We shall certainly attempt to deal with this subject early next session; but of course it would be quite impossible for me to go beyond the general terms of that pledge and to give any detailed pledge on the subject.

*MAJOR EVANS-GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) asked if they might take it that it was the definite intention of the Government to reintroduce the Bill next session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry I was not clearly heard by my hon. friend. The Government do propose to introduce a Bill on this subject early next session.

*MR. PEEL (Manchester, S.) asked the right hon. Gentleman a Question of which he had given private notice, whether, in view of the fact that a small body of obstructives [Cries of "Order"]——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! A Question of that sort should be brought to the Table, so that it may be seen whether its terms are in order before it is put on the Paper.

MR. PEEL: With your permission, Sir, I will put it in other terms, and ask whether, in view of the fact that a small number of hon. Members ["Oh"], by repeating each other's arguments at continually increasing length ["Order"]——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Those terms would not be permitted, and the Question does not arise.

Redistribution Bill.

SIR WALTER GREENE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can now state if there is any likelihood of a Redistribution Bill being brought in next session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think, perhaps, I have already gone as far as I should go in sketching out the King's Speech for next session, and I should be unwilling to go further. But my hon. friend is well aware that this is a subject which has engaged, and is engaging, the most anxious attention of His Majesty's Government.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there will be a considerable redistribution of Tory seats at the next general election?

The Port of London Bill.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, for the convenience of the large interests involved, he will now say definitely when the Port of London Bill will be taken, or whether it may be considered abandoned, and, in that case, when its discharge from the Order-book will be moved.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think the prospects of this Bill are at all favourable. I understand that a great deal of opposition has been aroused on the subject, and it would be quite impossible, in the face of any serious opposition, to carry the Bill in the present state of public business. But I cannot make any further declaration on the subject at present.

*MR. PEEL: May I ask whether, in view of the paramount necessity for setting up some authority to control the Port of London, and in view of the great interests in favour of such a measure, the right hon. Gentleman will undertake, as far as he can, of course subject to other matters, to introduce substantially the same measure early next year.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I confess that I view the position of this Bill with great regret, a Bill which I cannot help thinking is important not only from a Metropolitan, but even from a national point of view. But if, as is the case, the representatives of the Metropolis do not take that view, it is not easy to deal with the Bill. Moreover, the Bill is not an ordinary public Bill, but a hybrid Bill, which requires notices to be given involving great expense and difficulties above the ordinary.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Will the right hon. Gentleman specify more particularly from what quarter the opposition to this Bill has come, and can the Motion for the discharge of the Bill be put down in such a way as to give the House an opportunity of discussing the reasons why the Bill has been withdrawn?

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): Does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that the opposition to the Bill comes from Metropolitan Members.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir, I do. I think the request of the hon. Member for Poplar goes beyond ordinary precedent. If hon. Gentlemen desire to discuss Government Bills both when they are introduced and when they are discharged, the difficulties of carrying on public business will be greatly increased.

The Licensing Bill — Clauses 3 and 4.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked Mr. Speaker whether the charges and payments imposed by Clauses 3 and 4, as they stood and as they were proposed to be amended by the Government, ought not to be considered first by a Money Committee before the House could take cognisance of them.

*MR. SPEAKER: I have looked into this question, and have come to the conclusion that it is not a case in which a Money Committee is required.

Colonial Office Vote.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now say definitely when the Colonial Office Vote will be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot promise on what Thursday the Colonial Vote will be taken. It may be Thursday week or Thursday fortnight. It will largely depend on the view taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the topics it is most desirable to discuss in Committee of Supply.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): The general feeling on this side of the House is to have this discussion, if possible, as soon as may be after the Papers are in the hands of Members.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that any representation of that kind from him must and ought necessarily to carry great weight with the Government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Has the right hon. Gentleman any statement to make as to business?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope my right hon. friend the Secretary for War will be able to make his statement on Thursday. On Friday we propose to take the Second Reading of the Defaulting Authorities Bill.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

George Charles Bingham, Esquire, commonly called Lord Bingham, for the County of Surrey (North Western or Chertsey Division).

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL [LORDS].

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 267.]

NEW BILL.

POST OFFICE BILL.

"To amend the Post Office Acts with respect to cumulative commissions on money orders and the use of embossed and impressed stamps," presented by Lord Stanley; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 268].

LICENSING BILL [2ND ALLOTTED DAY].

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2:—

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee) moved an Amendment to limit the compensation proposed in the Bill to small houses, under £50 annual value, with the object of moving subsequently, as a consequential Amendment, that "In all other cases the compensation shall be calculated in like manner, except that for the purpose of this calculation the licence shall be assumed to be chargeable with a duty of Excise equal to five times the duty now payable." He explained that his object was to discriminate between the licences of small and large houses. Licensed houses under £50 in annual value were charged with a licence duty of, roughly, 50 per cent. of that annual value. In the case of a house valued at £10 the duty was 60 per cent. At the other end of the scale a house with an annual value of £700 was charged a duty representing 8½ per cent., and a house valued at £2,000 paid less than 3 per cent. If charged at the same rate as the smaller houses, these larger houses would pay £350 and £1,000 respectively in licence duty, and even then they would pay a great deal less than the value of the monopoly which the State had conferred upon them. How did the Home Secretary justify the proposal in the Bill? Did he contend that the licensees had a vested interest in the maintenance of the present scale of licence duties, or did he maintain that a duty of 3 per cent. was sufficiently high? If not, then he should accept the Amendment, which would redress to some extent the injustice of the inequality that now prevailed. For the first time the House, and to some extent the country, had realised that a great monopoly value brought into existence by the State was being handed over to private persons. That had gone on for twenty-five years, but it would not go on for ever. It would be in the power of a new Parliament to say that this monopoly value would be taken by the State by means of an increase in the licence duties. If a future Chancellor of the Exchequer should increase these duties to ten times their present amount then all licences in existence after the passing of such a Budget would have, for the purposes of compensation, one-tenth of the value they possessed before. But the licences that had already been extinguished would have been compensated on the scale provided by the Bill. An anomaly would thus be created which would be held up as a grievance; and this was the time for anticipating such a grievance. He ventured to think that his proposal afforded the most satisfactory method of dealing with it.

"In page 1, line 27, at the beginning, to insert the words 'In the case of premises having an annual value, taken as for the purposes of the publican's licence duty, under fifty pounds.'"—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CARSON, Dublin University) declined to follow the hon. Member into his argument upon vested interest. The Committee had already passed the first clause providing that compensation was to be paid. In his opinion the Amendment was impossible. It proposed that a licence-holder should be compensated, not for a loss which he had really sustained having regard to the existing law, but upon the assumption that at some future time the amount of his licence duty would be five times as great as it was now. There was an inequality in the amount paid in licence duties. The Government had attempted in some degree to remedy that inequality by charging a higher proportion upon houses valued at over £50 than upon houses under that amount for the compensation fund. That was the proper and, indeed, the only possible way of dealing with the question.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

*SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.) moved to insert after "where"—the first word of Clause 2—the words "within fourteen years after the passing of this Act," and he explained that if that Amendment were carried he proposed to move—as a consequential Amendment—to insert at the end of the first sub-section of the clause, "And after the fourteen years have expired there shall be paid as compensation to the persons interested in the licensed premises such a sum as shall be equal to the total payments which shall have been made during the said fourteen years in respect of the charges imposed on such premises under Section 3, Sub-section 1, of this Act." This raised the question of a time limit in a sense different from the time limit raised on Clause 1. The Amendments certainly proposed to limit the time during which the full value of the licence was to be paid by way of compensation; but, after the period of fourteen years, compensation was still to go on in a limited form. His object was to limit the whole amount of compensation which would be paid under the Bill, rather than to raise the vexed question of a time limit, although he did raise a time limit incidentally. There was a strong opinion, shared by many inside and outside the House, that the compensation proposed to be given under the Bill was excessive and unjustifiable. It was unjustifiable because he thought that the circumstances of the case as they stood at present had not been considered sufficiently by the Government. What he feared from the practical point of view was that if the present scale of compensation was maintained the reduction of licences in the future would be very much curtailed.

As far as he could judge the position of the fund—although it was difficult to form an opinion on it, and he had hoped the Government would give their calculation as to how many licences would be refused in a given time—as far as he could judge, if the full amount of compensation was to be paid, the reduction of licensed houses for the next twenty years would be very small indeed. He was a supporter of the Bill, and especially of the compensation clauses, because he believed they would have an effect on the licensing justices which would induce and assist them to reduce the number of licensed houses to a greater degree than they had done hitherto. He thought there was a case for compensation in equity, if not in justice, when there was the disturbance which there would be if a large number of licences were withdrawn within a limited period—there was a case in equity owing to the disturbance of the natural expectation which the trade had formed, rightly or wrongly, that there would be a renewal of licences except for misconduct. In these circumstances he thought if the natural expectation were violently and suddenly disturbed, although it had no foundation in law, it was a case for equitable consideration. But these grounds, it appeared to him, did not at all justify the extreme measure for compensation in perpetuity provided by the Bill. There was no case of vested interest—no case of perpetuity of tenure. The discretion of the justices was absolute. That, he understood, was admitted by the Government, and, if so, he held that it ought to be the starting point and the basis on which equitable consideration might be founded in providing compensation for those dispossessed. But the Bill appeared to ignore these considerations altogether. It did not appear to proceed on the considerations he had put before the Committee. If there was an absolute vested interest, if there was undeniable perpetuity of tenure, and if the licensing justices had no discretion at all, he could not conceive that there should be a larger measure of compensation given under the circumstances. As the facts did not coincide with that view it was evident that there might very legitimately be some limitation of the full value compensation which was offered by the Bill in perpetuity. That scale of compensation, he held, was excessive and uncalled for.

Sir William Houldsworth.

His own opinion, and he thought it was also the opinion of a large number, was that ample time notice and pecuniary compensation for licences withdrawn while the time notice was running would fully meet the case. It had been said that a time notice had already been given—that licence-holders had had a time notice for a great number of years. Therefore it might be that the time notice, and compensation during the period of that time notice, might meet the case. But inasmuch as it was hoped and expected that there would be a much larger reduction in the number of licensed houses than had hitherto taken place on the ground simply that they were not required, he thought there was a case for a time limit beyond that which existed at present under the decision in "Sharpe v. Wakefield." Thus he was quite prepared to support a further time notice in this Bill with full compensation up to the expiry of the time. He himself thought that was generous treatment. It was all that could be expected and he wondered that the Government had not taken some line of that sort in framing the Bill. It must be remembered also that during the period while the time notice was running, and while redundant licences were being withdrawn, the trade would receive additional compensation in the way of the additional value given to the licences which were left. In the circumstances he thought that fourteen years of full value compensation was ample, but he would not quarrel very much over a longer period. He thought, however, the proposal he made was treating the trade with very great generosity in the circumstances in which they were placed.

Now he came to the main point of his Amendment. He thought there was considerable force in the objection taken in the earlier debates on the time limit question when it was contended that it was not fair for the trade to be compelled by the Bill to contribute to the compensation fund and after a certain period to be excluded from all the benefit of compensation. He thought there was an answer to the objection, but he would not trouble the Committee with it, because he had come to the conclusion that it was an objection that ought to be fairly met. He had endeavoured to do so by the second part of his Amendment which provided for stopping the full value compensation at the end of fourteen years. In addition to that, he thought they ought not to lay hold of the contributions towards the compensation fund which had been given by the trade for houses which after fourteen years might have their licences withdrawn, and, therefore, he thought it was only fair in the case of houses whose licences were withdrawn after the fourteen years period that there should be repayment of the contributions that had been made by them. He did not know whether he had made the point clear. He was trying to meet the objection raised, and also trying to do what he thought was most important, that was, to reduce the amount of compensation to be paid under the Bill, because he was convinced that the amount of compensation provided would not reduce licensed houses to the extent public opinion desired and which almost every man desired to see. There were only two ways of doing it. One was to increase the charges in the schedule. He should be glad to hear whether the Government were prepared to increase these charges. If the compensation to be paid was to remain the same, and if the compensation was to hold out, then the charges in the schedule must be increased. If the Government did not do that, the other way was by reducing the compensation paid. As the Amendment gave full compensation for fourteen years he thought the repayment of the contributions would meet the case. He was inclined to think that if the alternative were put to them, whether they would have the schedule charges increased or a limit to full compensation after fourteen years, the trade would choose the arrangement he proposed.

He would only say in conclusion that this was an attempted compromise between two contending parties. He was afraid that it might share the fate of nearly all compromises of pleasing nobody. At any rate, anxious as he was to see this Bill passed because he believed there was a good deal of temperance reform in it, they must, if possible, try to erect a golden bridge between the two views which were held with regard to the time limit or no time limit. He would appeal to the Government not to ignore the very strong opinion which was held and expressed outside this House on the subject. and in quarters where it could not be said there were extreme temperance advocates. He thought he might call them moderate temperance reformers, although he understood that they were not thought much of in the House. He believed there was a large body of people in the country not identified with the temperance movement at all, who, considering that the proposals in the Bill, if passed, would so revolutionise the position of the trade, and so completely change the tenure of licences for all future years, were not favourable to even getting under these conditions the advantages which they saw under the Bill. If the Government could not see their way to accept the solution he ventured to put before them for their consideration, he hoped that they would, at any rate, endeavour, before the Bill passed, to make some proposal which would meet, to some extent, the very strong opinion which was felt inside and outside the House, and which came from quarters entitled to consideration and respect. He felt convinced that if the Government could see their way to make some conciliatory proposal in this direction, they would not only ensure the passing of the Bill, but, what was quite as important, make it more acceptable to the people of the country. He did not think there was great danger of the Government doing much harm to the trade by accepting the Amendment. He thought he might even appeal to the representatives of the trade in the House, that having made such a good bargain already, they might for their comfort and happiness afterwards very well consider whether they might not, in some way or other, give back a little of what it appeared was going to be given to them. If they did so he thought they would be rewarded afterwards. The Bill would be more heartily accepted by the people of this country if the Government adopted the Amendment, or something in the direction he had indicated, while it would not do a great deal of harm to the trade. He begged to move.

"In page 1, line 27, after the word 'Where,' to insert the words 'within fourteen years after the passing of this Act.'"—(Sir William Houldsworth.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEELY (Lincoln) said that on a point of order, might he ask whether this Amendment would rule out of order the Amendment standing in his name on p. 24, dividing up and providing for limiting the compensation?

*THE CHAIRMAN said that the hon. Member had better raise the point at a later stage, and in the meantime he would consider it.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) thought this was the most important Amendment put down since the Bill had been presented to the House. It was rightly described by the right hon. Baronet as an honest compromise honestly proposed. He himself went a good deal further than the right hon. Gentleman, but he believed that the Bill would be far better, or rather less bad, if this proposal were accepted. He recognised that it contained a great deal that was valuable, and he should heartily support it if the Committee were obliged to divide upon the question—which he hoped would not be the case. They were discussing the clauses of this Bill under conditions which made it a duty to compress as much as possible all that they had to say on this important subject, but he thought it was most desirable in reference to this measure that there should be some time hereafter at which the nation should be at liberty to resume its right to deal with the extremely difficult question of licensing according to its own best judgment and discretion. Now, it was admitted that the trade was an extremely dangerous trade, however carefully conducted. What the Bill, as it stood, proposed to enact was that existing licences should be enjoyed by the licensees in perpetuity, subject to being bought out at their full value. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the terms of purchase were such that they made any great reduction impossible; but, in addition to that, they were such as to fasten finally and for ever the existing system of the licensing laws on this country. To his mind that was a most important consideration They would fasten definitely and inalienably the present system of licensing laws for all time unless they were to pay an enormous sum in order to cover a change. It was said £125,000,000, but he thought it would be a great deal more.

It seemed to him that they ought to ask themselves this question, "Is it desirable, in the public interest, that the existing system of licensing laws should be perpetuated in such a way that it could not be dealt with by succeeding generations?" The system was based on private enterprise—upon an unrestricted right to make private profit by the use of a State monopoly—concentrated in the hands of a comparatively small number of persons and companies. The disadvantages of the system had been fully admitted on all hands. The Prime Minister himself said that it was regrettable that this system had been allowed to grow up in the form of a monopoly without something having been paid to the State for that monopoly. Without looking at it from a moral point of view, it was unfortunate that a licensing system should have been allowed to grow up which for private profit undoubtedly encouraged excessive drinking; which was socially dangerous; which led to the sale of drink of an injurious character, and to the displacement of non-alcoholic drink; which resulted in unsatisfactory police supervision and to a few cases of corruption in connection with police supervision. There had also grown up an extremely powerful trade organisation which naturally was opposed to any change which might affect their vested interests. There was, he thought, reason to apprehend that these effects would be inflamed instead of being mitigated by the passing of this Bill. But be that so, or be it not, it was at all events fair that they or their children should at some future time be able to alter the whole of the existing licensing system. He would not enter into the various methods by which that could be accomplished. Suffice it to say that it might be thought that this trade was not a proper subject for private profit earning, because it pushed the sale of drink to the detriment of social welfare, and because it was unfair for the State to bestow a monopoly on private persons or companies. This much was perfectly clear that they, or their posterity, probably in progressive times, would desire to alter a system which had been proved to be disastrous in the public interest.

This Amendment provided one method by which the public could, at a date hereafter, reassert its rights on possible terms. Was it just to those who were at present licensed? He was not going to apply a standard of justice which commended itself to his own mind, but would approach it from the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman. He assumed that there was what was called a moral right to compensation on behalf of the trade. But what was the nature and scope of the existing rights of the licensees and also the custom and practice of the magisterial benches in this matter? The position of the licensees at the present moment was that they had a good expectation, not resting on any legal title, but resting upon the general practice of the licensing justices, that if they conducted their houses well their licences would be renewed. Now, he held that they had already had considerable time notice that that was not the case—certainly since the decision in "Sharpe v. Wakefield." But there had never been any real doubt, even before that judgment, on the subject at all. Again, it was not the case that the practice to renew licences had been uniform. In the Brewers' Almanac for 1904 there was a statement of the number of licences of which renewals were refused in the nine years preceding 1903. In these nine years 1,337 licences were refused renewal solely on the ground that they were not required in the public interest, and without any compensation. Many others were refused on mixed grounds—that they were not required, that the premises were structurally defective, or that the licensee was neglectful in the conduct of the house. He did not wish to magnify the effect of these figures; but he wanted to point out that it was impossible to say that there had been a uniform and constant custom of renewing licences on good behaviour. There had been a good expectation, and nothing more. There had not been, in practice, certainty of renewal any more than there had been in law a right. That was the real position, fairly stated. Now, if they were going to deal with these licences, if they were going to take them away on a large scale—he doubted if that would be the effect of the Bill—if they were going to bestow compensation on the dispossessed licensees, it was to be remembered that there were other persons to be considered. If they gave more than a fair compensation for a good expectation they would be unjust to the public.

How was that expectation to be appraised? The right hon. Baronet proposed to give in addition to the absolute legal close time fourteen years notice. He agreed that there should be a close time during which it should not be lawful to refuse to renew a licence without compensation. "Close time" was perhaps not a very happy expression; but he meant a period during which a man could not be shot at. Fourteen years would be ample for that purpose. They were asked to look at the question from the point of view of equity to the licence-holder; but they should also regard it from the point of view of equity to the community. The community had bestowed a great gift on the licence-holders, and had refrained from imposing new taxation on them. In America licensees had to pay ten times the amount that was paid in this country; and it was the immunity from taxation that created the monopoly value. Further, there had been four or five Acts during the last thirty years which had immensely enhanced the value of those licences. It was one of the laws of monopoly that the more you restricted it the more valuable it became. Licences had been restricted, they had been reduced in number, and that increased the value of the remaining licences. They, therefore, had a right to regard the question from the point of view of the origin of the licences, and ask fairly whether property of that character should be regarded as if it were freehold property. He thought that if the Amendment were accepted the Bill would be immensely improved and strengthened. Certainly one of his greatest objections to the measure would be removed. Something in the nature of a compromise should be arrived at. If the Bill were passed into law in the face of an extremely strong body of hostile opinion outside the House, by no means confined to members of one particular Party, it could not be regarded as a final settlement. It would be only human nature to endeavour to repeal the Act; and that would produce a condition of chaos which would be extremely unpleasant. The instinct and the inclination of the people of this country were not to unduly disturb legislation which had been passed; but no such feeling could possibly be entertained in connection with this Bill if a compromise were not arrived at. Speaking for himself, a great deal of his hostility to the Bill would be removed if the Amendment were accepted. He did not think it was the best possible Amendment, but it was an honest attempt at a compromise; and for his part he would be gratified if the Government would accept it.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) said he thought that everybody would agree that the two speeches to which the Committee had listened, whether convincing or not, were at all events models of temperate statement. Not only had the Amendment been put before the Committee in a most persuasive manner, but he was perfectly ready to admit that there was a great body of public opinion outside that House, not identified with Party, with extreme temperance views, or with the trade, and quite detached from considerations that perhaps weighed with Party politicians, who would gladly see some change made in the Bill in the direction now suggested. It was with profound reluctance, therefore, that he had to say again that he was really quite unable to follow the logic of the proposals now before them. Of the objects he entirely approved; the methods of advocating those objects had his heartiest sympathy; but when he came to the hard reasons which lay at the root of those suggestions he confessed that he was still unpersuaded. There was a certain inconsistency running through many of the speeches he had heard from the opposite side of the House which was not absent from the speech of the last hon. Gentleman who addressed them. In the earlier part of his speech the hon. and learned Gentleman said they were perpetually riveting round the necks of reformers a system which they would desire to alter at some more or less remote date. But the learned Gentleman went on to say in a different part of his speech what really amounted to the whole thing being reversed next year or three years hence. He quite agreed that such reversals had been unfortunate in the past, and probably would be in the future, but that was a very different proposal from telling them that the House had, by that Bill, entered into an obligation of honour to the licence-holders which made it absolutely impossible for it ever to reverse the decision come to.

SIR ROBERT REID: What I meant was that this Act, so long as it remains an Act, does not create an obligation of honour, but of law. It is quite consistent with that, that any of us who think we are not fairly treated may do our best to get the Act of Parliament repealed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that was really what he tried to convey to the Committee. It was impossible to talk of a Bill which could be reversed next year or the year after, whenever hon. Gentlemen opposite were in office, as perpetually riveting on the necks of reformers in this country some unreversible order. He did not think the House ought to, or would, repeal this Bill, but it was not under the circumstances an unrepealable law. There were many cases, such as if Parliament were to pass an Act cutting us adrift from all our colonies, where from the nature of the change no repeal would be possible, but this was not one of them. Whether it would be equitable to reverse it depended on the system which was to be substituted for it, and as he did not know what that system was, even in the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, he would not argue about it.

Let them consider whether, if they came to the root of the matter, there really was anything which ought to induce them to accept the Amendment. He could show very strong temperance ground why the Amendment should not be adopted, but there was nothing in the Bill to prevent some future generation, when it was agreed upon any scheme, from being able to bring that scheme into operation, and it could do that, of course, as it could deal with licences now, either honestly or dishonestly. They could either do it by treating the equitable claim of the licence-holder equitably, or they could do it by treating the equitable claim of the licence-holder inequitably, and there was nothing, in his judgment, in this Bill which made it more difficult to do this. He really did not wish to go back on old debates, but the root principle of the Bill was compulsory insurance out of the pockets of the trade. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might say it was not paid out of the pockets of the trade, but if they did so they would have to admit that it was impossible for the trade to pay anything towards this object. After all, they could only raise this money by some form of taxation of licences; and, if the taxation of licences did not carry with it the fact that the trade paid that taxation, it was impossible, from the nature of the case, that the trade under any circumstances or by any arrangement could pay it out of their own pockets. He thought he was justified in saying that it was compulsory insurance paid out of the pockets of the trade.

The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, and he thought his hon. friend, took the view that, if the trade were obliged to pay this compensation for fourteen years, and for fourteen years were prevented from being evicted, except with compensation, they had all the compensation that ought to be allowed to them. His hon. friend went further than that in his Amendment, while the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite suggested that at the end of a period which he called, but miscalled, a close time, the community would be in absolutely free possession of all existing licences, not merely legally, but equitably and righteously, and they might be able to adopt any plan they liked for the future. He traversed that statement altogether. If they chose to give a really close time—say, for the sake of argument, fourteen years—and if they chose to say that no licences were to be withdrawn for fourteen years, of course that would be an immense compensation to the trade. That would be a close time in reality as well as in name, because during that time every licence-holder would be protected from having his licence taken away, he would be able to insure himself so that at the end of fourteen years he would not be injured, and he would not be asked in the meanwhile to pay to the insurance fund of which his hon. friend spoke. But until they made the close time a reality he could not admit that it was in any sense a substitute for the plan they had proposed in the Bill. And supposing they did carry it out, did they think the magistrates or those who had got to administer the Act would feel themselves then in a better position to deal with excessive licences than they felt now? He could not think they would. They would find themselves face to face then, as they did now, with men who under the existing law had been required to spend very large sums of money upon their premises, who had got the expectation of which the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke, and who had been taxed for all these years on their property. They would be face to face with precisely the same class of hardship which, as they knew, in every part of the country hampered the discretion of the ordinary magisterial bench.

In these circumstances it appeared to him that they would be doing away with of the great merits of this Bill without substituting anything really good in its place. If they chose to start a sinking fund out of public money, no doubt they would be able to buy up all the licences in the country He did not advise them to do it, but, if they did, a very small sacrifice on the part of the public would enable them completely, at a given time in the future, to reverse, if it were thought worth while to reverse, the present system of giving licences. But he ventured to say that it really was not wise to mar this scheme because they thought that at some date in the future they would have discovered and be agreed upon some quite different scheme which, when they had discovered and were agreed upon, they would be able quite honestly to impose upon the licence-holder if they compensated him and dishonestly if they refused to compensate him. He wanted a great and immediate reduction of licences, and that great and immediate reduction could only be obtained on the one condition that the local authority was able, where it thought fit, to borrow a large sum of money upon the security of this taxation. But the immediate and great benefits which he, at all events, hoped from this Bill would be altogether diminished if they restricted the number of years in which the capital and sinking fund were to be borrowed and repaid.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH said he did not propose to limit the charges. What he was limiting was the amount of compensation paid out of the compensation fund. He expected the capitalisation would go on, and the levy would continue. Therefore he saved the compensation fund.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said it was perfectly true that his hon. friend would save the compensation fund if he compelled the trade to go on insuring their licences long after the insurance had ceased to be effective. If he compelled the trade, after the fourteen years were up, to pay as much for insurance as they paid before, but to get nothing for it, then his hon. friend would save the compensation fund, but surely at the same time he would be committing something very near to a great injustice upon the licence-holder, and he could not believe that, on reflection, that was a proposal he would seriously advocate. The Amendment was not required in the interests of new experiments. Those new experiments could be tried when the country was agreed upon them. He saw no beginning at the present time of any such agreement, and, considering how fierce were the passions which the temperance controversy aroused, he had little hope of seeing men all equally earnestly desirous agreeing upon what they considered a wise and sound plan of temperance reform. If the time should come when such an agreement was arrived at, there was not a comma in this Bill which would put the smallest obstacle in the way of some future Prime Minister, more happily situated than he was, carrying out some great scheme of temperance reform which would conciliate all sides and all opinions, and really bring to an end this long, and, he feared, unending controversy.

*MR. WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley) assured the Prime Minister that when this subject came to be dealt with in another Parliament it would be the wish of all on that side of the House to deal with it honestly, but what would then be honest depended very largely upon what was done now. If the trade were given rights and position which it did not at present possess, it would be necessary to do much more to be honest than was now necessary. This Bill was more than just to the trade; an excessive amount of compensation was being given for an excessive period, and what was more than justice to the trade was less than justice to the public. The analogy which had been urged with regard to assurance was somewhat false. There were such things as temporary assurances. Fire and accident assurances were effected for a period of years, but if no fire or accident occurred there was no return other than the security enjoyed during the period. People did not expect to get their money back at the end of the time. There were also temporary assurances against death. It was true the ordinary form of assurance was against death whenever it occurred, but the premium then was much higher. Under the present proposal the premium was low, the assurance was a temporary one to cover the risk of loss of licence during a given period, and there was no validity whatever in the contention that the sums paid should be repaid at the end of the period. What was required was equitable consideration. Temperance reformers desired, and it was in their interest, to treat the trade fairly. The more extreme they were and the more licences they desired to see abolished, the more it was in their interest to treat the trade fairly and equitably, because they could not get rid of licences without persuading the public of the necessity, and it would be much more difficult to do that if there was any sense of hardship or unfairness connected with it. Their complaint against the Bill was that it went beyond all that was equitable and reasonable, that it gave excessive compensation for an excessive period, and was therefore unjust to the public.

With regard to the provision of compensation the business-like way of proceeding would be to take out a temporary assurance against the loss of the licence —and that was what the Bill provided. But at the end of the period the public should be at liberty to deal with the licences as they wished, and that practically meant that the value of the licences should cease at the end of the period. The proper means of meeting that contingency was for the owner and occupier to set up a sinking fund to cover the possible loss. The extra profit which the reduction in licences would bring to the remaining houses would be ample to provide a sufficient sinking fund for that purpose. The Prime Minister had suggested that fourteen years was too short a period. Personally he had never been disposed to insist upon a hard-and-fast line as to time; so long as full freedom was given to the justices and the public to carry out any reform they desired, he was not particular as to the number of years. If ample time were given, a sinking fund could very easily be set up, and the licence-holder would suffer no loss whatever. The contention that if the period were limited to fourteen years the sum raised would be too small to secure anything like an adequate reduction implied that the Prime Minister contemplated the borrowing of money for more than fourteen years, because unless money was borrowed on the security of the levy for more than fourteen years, there would be precisely the same reduction during the fourteen years as if there were no limit. It was a serious thing if the Government intended to allow borrowing for anything like that period. It would mean that during the time that all the levy was allocated in advance, practically all control over the liquor trade would be lost. The one thing that gave the authorities any control over the trade was the power to refuse the renewal of licences; that power was being limited by the necessity of paying compensation, but if the compensation fund were allocated for fourteen years it would disappear altogether. Personally, he objected altogether to the idea of borrowing. It was perfectly true that in one year sufficient money could not be raised to secure an adequate reduction of licences, but there was no reason why the levy should not be spread over a considerable number of years without borrowing. As a matter of fact, there ought not to be any limit to the levy, and personally he would be prepared to assent to the fund being increased by special levies on beer and spirits. The mover of the Amendment put the case very forcibly when he said that at present there was no vested interest or perpetual tenure, and the magistrates had full power. Under this Bill the position of the licence-holder would be altogether altered to the disadvantage of the public.

In regard to a time limit of some sort, he thought the old Church leases were on all fours with these licences, and that the precedent set in their case was an extremely valuable one. For 100 or 200 years it had been the custom for the Church to grant its leases illegally. The statutes forbade leases except for twenty-one years in possession, and forty years for mining and building, but the Church was in the habit of granting renewals on the payment of fines. Many Committees of both Houses of Parliament sat and endeavoured to provide means of getting rid of the difficulty, because the leases became enormously valuable properties. A Committee of the House of Lords in 1851 reported that for 200 years these leases had been illegally granted. They were made the subject not only of mortgage but of settlement and devise with limitations to children and their posterity. Legacy duty had been paid for years to the Government on the expectancy of renewal, and the Court of Chancery, in settling marriage settlements, had made these twenty-one year leases the subject of settlement and devise, with limitations extending to grand-children and great-grand-children. That showed how these leases had been regarded and dealt with by the law. There was a case in Paddington where it was decided to allow the land to be built upon, and Parliament allotted two-thirds of the value to the tenant and one-third to the Church, thus recognising the enormous interest the leaseholder had in that property. In 1860 Parliament dealt with these leases and handed them over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and provided that no lease should be renewed after 1884, and those which expired before 1884 should only be extended to that year, and that was practically imposing a time limit. These leases were granted in violation of the law and became valuable property, and this House dealt with them in the same way as it was now suggested that these licences should be dealt with, because they brought in the element of a time limit as the basis of an equitable settlement.

The Amendments put down within the last few days to Clause 4 suggested the desirability of accepting some such Amendment as this. The basis of the new licences was to be a time limit not exceeding seven years, which was deemed sufficient to recoup the licence-holder for his investment. The present Amendment suggested fourteen years for the old licences. If seven years was enough for the new licences, surely fourteen years would be ample for the old ones. When the right hon. Gentleman dealt with a similar proposal to this upon a former occasion he made much of the insecurity of the tenure, and he said if they had anything like a time limit the holder of the licence would become very careless, and all sorts of evil would result. At that time he (the hon. Member) ventured to point out to the Prime Minister that security of tenure had proved to be the source of a great deal of mismanagement in the worst class of houses. As it was now proposed that the new licences should terminate at the end of seven years, it would have been very curious if the Prime Minister had repeated his old argument. Therefore they might dismiss that argument as having no bearing on the case now. It was important to remember that the proposal for the new licences meant that a large additional value would be given to the existing licences. This new proposal practically meant that no new licence was ever to be issued again upon the same conditions as the present ones. That placed existing licences in an exceptional position, and gave them an increased market value. Now they were being deprived of the power to deal freely with them. That proposal would give the present licences an extraordinary market value; and this point ought to be taken into consideration in connection with the time limit which had been suggested. Surely this Bill ought to provide some opportunity at some time or other of getting the whole of the licences upon the new revised system. There ought to be some period fixed when the revised licensing system would come into force, and that was a strong argument against establishing a system of perpetuity in licences.

Sir JOHN GORST (Cambridge University) said he wished to say a few words in support of his hon. friend's Amendment. What they were discussing was really the amount of compensation which ought to be paid. The hon. Member for Manchester said the amount fixed by the Bill was too great and it was quite evident that that was the opinion of the general public, because since this Bill had been introduced, as he had stated upon a former occasion, there had been an extraordinary rise in the value of shares in all the great brewery companies on the Stock Exchange. The hon. Baronet the Member for Peckham had stated that this rise was only an example of the general rise of securities which had taken place in recent times. That was not so because he had received letters from directors and shareholders in great brewery companies saying that it was a fact that the introduction of this Bill had increased the value of their shares by giving a security of tenure where there had been no security of tenure before. When an insecure tenure was turned into a secure one it did raise the value of the property and to that extent in this case it did an injustice to the public. He agreed that the Amendment which the Government had proposed to Clause 4 entirely altered this question of a time limit, and it was exactly what he himself had put down on the Paper as an Amendment with regard to new licences. New licences were to have a seven years run, and at the end of that time the licensing authority was to have the most perfect freedom to make the best they could of the licence and renew it to someone else at an increased rental. All that was proposed in this case was to purchase from the existing licence-holders the right to place them on the same footing as all new licence-holders. If they did not accept some kind of time limit they would have two classes of licences. The old licences would become extremely valuable under this Bill. They had heard a great deal about the pre-1869 beerhouses, but they were now setting up pre-1904 beerhouses. The Prime Minister said that this Bill was no obstacle to future licensing reform. Everyone knew what an obstacle the pre-1869 beerhouses had been, and it was not at all certain that the pre-1904 beerhouses would not prove just as great an obstacle to temperance reform as the pre-1869 beerhouses had done.

The principle of this Amendment was a very simple one and he could not understand the inability of the First Lord of the Treasury to accept it. He recognised that in past times a very valuable monopoly which really was the property of the public was, under the law, given to the licence-holders. It ought to have been sold to them as it was going to be in the future. The law did not allow that and the justices who granted a licence had no alternative but to make a very valuable present of public property to somebody or other. It was recognised as a sort of expectation which had grown up and which they ought not to absolutely confiscate but which ought to be purchased from the holder at a reasonable value. The whole question was, what was the proper compensation to pay the existing licence-holders for giving up the monopoly which they now enjoyed? He did not pretend to say whether it ought to be enjoyment for a period of fourteen or twenty-one years, but clearly it ought to be for some definite term of years. The licence-holder at present had no legal right to a renewal of his licence. It was only an expectation but they were now giving him a right to renewal unless he was compensated for the full value of the licence taken from him. The proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for North-west Manchester was that during a period of fourteen years no licence should be taken away unless compensation was given to the holder. It was said that this was a compulsory insurance by the publicans out of their own funds. He thought that a great deal too much had been made of that point by the supporters of this Bill. There was no reason whatever why a fund for public purposes should not be raised by increasing the licensing tax, and if the State chose to increase the licensing tax for the purposes of compensation, it was really giving the publicans compensation out of public funds. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No."] It was giving the publicans compensation out of funds which might be raised by Parliament and devoted to public purposes. Nothing in the world was easier than the making of a calculation of the amount required to give compensation for fourteen years and no longer. The actuary of any insurance company would at once calculate the amount that would have to be paid for fourteen years and no longer. The Solicitor-General had asked what they were going to do at the end of fourteen years. The answer was that at the end of fourteen years the licence-holder would have no further right to a renewal of the licence. The question was, is it a fair and reasonable bargain to the holders of existing licences to give them fourteen years secure tenure in exchange for the precarious tenure which they now have? His opinion was that it was fair, and he thought the general opinion certainly was that the perpetual tenure given them by the Government in this Bill was too much, as the rise in brewery shares incontestably showed.

There was one point of the Bill which had never been properly explained, and that was the words in the clause which provided that the compensation was to be "calculated as if this Act had not passed." This expression might have a sinister meaning for the licence-holders. It might mean that the compensation was to be calculated as if the tenure was the present precarious annual tenure and not the perpetual right to their licences which the publicans thought they were getting and which evidently the investors on the Stock Exchange thought they were getting. Was there any trap in these words, "calculated as if this Act had not passed," to catch the holders of existing licences? It might turn out that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North-west Manchester was really more advantageous to the holders of licences than the terms of the Bill. The publicans ought to be careful that they were getting the boon they expected. He could quite understand that for the next year or two it would be very easy for an experienced valuer to say in a case of compensation that if the Act of 1904 had not been passed the holder of this licence would have had a precarious annual tenure, that he would have been liable to lose his licence at the discretion of brewster sessions, and that, therefore, he would not value it at more than five or six years purchase. That was very much less than the fourteen years proposed by the Amendment, and which the Member for North-w st Manchester, was willing to concede to the existing licence-holders. But his difficulty about the words was in regard to what would happen twenty or thirty years hence, and what a valuer would then do if called upon to estimate the value of a licensed house "as if this Act had not passed." How would the valuer set about his work? He should like the Solicitor-General, or the hon. Member for the Stretford Division, who had experience in these valuation questions, or in the absence of these learned Gentlemen, the Home Secretary, to say definitely, first of all, how the value of a licence was to be estimated immediately after the Act was passed, and how the value was to be estimated twenty or thirty years afterwards. It would be a very great mistake if the trade allowed themselves to be contented with provisions which would not give them the protection they expected, and which would expose them to the risk of this particular Act being tampered with and altered by legislation in a future Parliament by people who might think that this Bill had not received due deliberation when passing through the House.

Sir EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick) said that as the Home Secretary had not risen to answer the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University as to the meaning of the words "calculated as if this Act had not passed," he should like to press the point, because it was a matter of the greatest importance. Both the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North-west Manchester and the Prime Minister spoke as supporters of the Bill, but it was plain from their speeches that in opinion they were worlds apart. The mover of the Amendment had complained that the Bill ignored the three main facts. It ignored that there was now no vested interest, and no perpetuity of tenure, and it ignored the fact that the discretion of the justices was absolute in the matter of refusing to renew licences. He did not profess to be able to reconcile the speech of the Prime Minister and that of the right hon. Member for North-west Manchester. But the ignoring of these facts in the Prime Minister's speech and in the Bill itself was a very considerable part of the case against the Bill. The Bill, moreover, was going to abolish the notice or warning to the trade, which the mover of the Amendment said existed already. The right hon. the Member for North-west Manchester said that moderate temperance reformers were not treated too well in the House. He admitted that he spoke rather slightingly the other day, not of the right hon. Gentleman, but of the class to which he belonged as being people who expressed their opinions but would not enforce them. While the speech of the right hon. Member for north-west Manchester was sound and satisfactory, he could not refrain from asking what was going to happen if the Amendment was rejected. The true type of a moderate man was the right hon. and learned Member for Dumfries who had made, as the Prime Minister himself admitted, a most moderate speech, in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that if this Amendment were carried, it would considerably modify his opinion in regard to the Bill. But if it was rejected by the Government, he remained an inveterate opponent of the Bill. Was the opinion of a moderate temperance reformer to be enforced? Would the right hon. Gentleman become an inveterate opponent of the Bill if the Amendment was rejected? That was the only way in which to enforce the opinion of moderate temperance reformers; but if the Amendment was not accepted then all the expressions of opinion about temperance reform by the right hon. Gentleman were absolutely useless. They would count for nothing unless the right hon. Gentleman changed his action from support of the Bill into hostility.

He maintained that the Bill placed private before public interest in this matter. Temperance reformers wanted freedom to reduce licences, to change to a better system in carrying on the liquor trade, and to increase the licence duties. When was that time going to come? The answer of the Government as embodied in the Bill was "Never," and this was the reason of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment. The Prime Minister said that future projects of temperance reform would not be prejudiced. The Bill, however, was being construed by the trade as giving them a title. If no Amendment of this kind was accepted, then, though he admitted that at present there was a claim for equitable consideration on behalf of the trade, he said that the Bill was going to transform the claim, not in equity, but in law. By doing this it was going to weaken very much the claim in equity; and if the Amendment was rejected, whatever the Bill might do in law, it was not attaching equity to what it did. Though it might be giving something in law, it was not only giving nothing, but removing something of the equitable consideration which many opponents of the measure felt to be due. That was why he joined in the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman who put this Amendment forward as an honest compromise. But the right hon. Gentleman also uttered a note of warning. He asked the trade to remember how good a bargain they were making at the present time—he supposed with the present Government—and to consider whether by being reasonable in accepting some Amendment of this kind they would not make themselves more comfortable in the hereafter. Even if the Amendment were accepted, he did not say that it would be regarded as absolutely satisfactory by all sections of temperance reformers, but it would do a good deal to weaken the resentment with which the Bill was being received. The Amendment, indeed, touched the very essence of the controversy, for it dealt with the question whether it was possible to turn the Bill into something which might be a measure of temperance reform, or whether it would not be a permanent barrier to temperance reform.

Mr CRIPPS (Lancashire, Stretford) said that the hon. Baronet opposite and others had argued as if the Bill provided something in the nature of excessive compensation to the trade or the owners of public-houses. But if they were to have anything in the nature of compensation at all, he contended that they could not have it in a more moderate or restricted form than in the Bill—if the measure was really understood. It had been argued that when licensed premises were taken for the purpose of public improvements two kinds of compensation were in force. There was a trading compensation and a compensation for a diminution in the value of the premises themselves. As a rule the trade compensation was the larger figure of the two; but in the Bill there was no trade compensation of any kind. They were looking at the difference in the value of the premises as licensed or unlicensed, and this did not bring into consideration what was known as trade compensation at all. He also contended that most absurd estimates had been published as to the price which would be paid by way of compensation under the Bill. All these estimates had been based on a misapprehension because those who had formulated them had not studied what the proposals of the Government were in the Bill. If compensation meant indemnity, as it did, it was only fair to take into consideration all the special conditions in each case, and nothing could be more unfair than to bring in a number of years which in some cases would be too many and in others too few.

They had to consider what was the chance of the renewal of a licence, if this Bill had not been passed. There were certain public-houses where the number of years purchase would be exceedingly small, because, having regard to the conditions, there was a great chance of the licences not being renewed. On the other hand, in the case of well-conducted public-houses, which were not likely to be interfered with, a much larger number of years purchase would be given; because if compensation meant indemnity all the special conditions in each particular case should be taken into consideration. In such circumstances, could anything be more unfair than to bring in a number of years which in some cases would give too much compensation, and in other cases would penalise properly conducted licensed houses. A larger measure of compensation would be given to the worst public-houses, and a smaller measure to the best conducted houses. Could any system of compensation which professed to be fair and equitable be worse than that? It could not be contended that the Bill would give a freehold or a permanent tenure. He would oppose that to the utmost, because it would give the licence-holder something to which he was not entitled. He would not give the licence-holder any greater interest than he had at present; and he could not imagine any member of the legal profession reading the Bill in any other sense.

If land were taken by a railway company it was valued for the purposes of compensation as it was, not as it would be when utilised by the railway company. Under this Bill, it was also expressly provided that the compensation should be assessed as if the Act had not been passed, and as if no increased security had been given. He thought it was of extreme importance that the question of compensation should be really understood and appreciated. There was no practical difficulty in the matter. After all, it was a case of insurance; and he could not understand the argument that it would be impossible in the future to put additional taxation on the property because of the insurance. The compensation was not in any sense a public tax; and, although he would demur to it at present, still if, in the future, additional taxation were thought to be fair, having regard to similar burdens on other classes, the present Bill would not prevent it. The word monopoly had been used. A railway company very often obtained from Parliament a very valuable monopoly. If, afterwards, it was found that the monopoly turned out to be more profitable than had been expected, was that any reason why the State should tax off the whole of the surplus profit. A principle of that kind would destroy all interest in statutory property. Having given a statutory expectation, the State could not annex the profits if the expectation turned out to be profitable. The Bill would not give the trade any greater right than it at present possessed; but, having regard to established expectation, they were entitled to have a fair measure of compensation assuming they conducted their business in a proper manner. He was not prepared to introduce a time limit, which, during its duration, would make any alteration of the law impossible. The Act might work well or badly. He believed it would work well; but if it worked badly it would be impossible during the period of the time limit to alter the law, however badly the Act might be operating. In that respect, he joined issue with the right hon. Baronet.

Sir EDWARD GREY said his argument was that Parliament always had the right.

Mr. CRIPPS said it would not have the right during the period of the time limit. That was why he objected to the Amendment. He did not want Parliament to be fettered in the event of the Act not working properly. He believed that the compensation to be provided would be sufficient without a time limit to reduce the number of public-houses by a third; and thereby effect a most desirable temperance reform.

Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) said the subjects which were dealt with by the hon. and learned Member for Stretford were intricate subjects and dealt with in an intricate way but they seemed to him to be rather remote from the Amendment of the hon. Member for Manchester. The First Lord of the Treasury could only defend this Bill by assuming facts that did not exist and ignoring facts that did.

The right hon. Gentleman commenced by assuming that the licence-holder had a perpetuity of tenure and therefore had a bona fide right to compensation and he was obliged to ignore what appeared to him to be a far more material part of the case, namely, that the licence-holder, or the brewer behind him, by this Bill would not only receive compensation but be put into a better position than before by reason of the fact that there would be less competition. It was under these circumstances that they failed to find any argument in the statements of the First Lord of the Treasury against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Manchester. He did, however, welcome one deliverance of the right hon. Gentleman which was also apparent in the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Stretford. Both were much impressed with the objects of temperance reform. They denied that any difficulty would be placed in the way of temperance reform because the power of Parliament to further temperance reform would remain the same as though this Bill had not passed. The hon. Member for Stretford could not possibly understand how matters could be made worse by this Bill because the powers of Parliament remained and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord refused to admit any argument adduced against this Bill in respect of the difficulty it put in the way of temperance reform. If a compromise like this was refused it was quite clear they were thrown back to a position in which this Bill had no moral force at all. That was the position forced upon them. They objected to the Bill, and felt that they could not do better than to give due notice that they noted what was said by the right hon. Gentleman that he did not think it would make any difference in the future. It would be, then, all the easier to induce some future Parliament to bring about those reforms which they thought were necessary before but which would be doubly necessary now.

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.) said the ingenious speech of the hon. Member for Stretford had shown very clearly that it was most desirable that this clause should be throughly discussed before it passed into law and that some explanation should be given by the Government as to the exact way in which it was to work. The learned Solicitor-General might be able to explain to the Committee the exact principle upon which the Inland Revenue would value, and how they were likely to value, licensed houses under this Bill. He feared the debate would have little practical result, but as he had a kindred Amendment upon the Paper he felt constrained to add a few words. His Amendment contained what was properly called a time limit, and he had always thought that justice rather than generosity should guide the amount of compensation and that it should be for a limited period and on a sliding scale. What was in his mind was that there should be a period when the public would be free to introduce a better licensing law. It was generally admitted that licence-holders now had only an equitable claim, but this Bill, if passed into law in its present shape, would give them a vested interest of a perpetual character and future Parliaments when they desired to interfere with those vested interests would always have this Bill held up to them in the future as giving a legal and moral claim to the licence-holder, a claim which he did not now possess. He therefore contended that, if this Amendment was not accepted, an impediment would be thrown in the way of preserving to the public the right of licensing public-houses. All that was required was to see that justice was done. There was no reason for being generous to the trade. The Government were tying the hands of the public authorities in the future. The result, no doubt, might be the closing of considerable numbers of useless and pernicious public-houses now, but they must not entirely sacrifice the future to the present, and they might well be content with a smaller sum of money than was contemplated by the right hon. Gentleman rather than adopt a policy which, though it might have striking results at present, would put the licensing authorities in great difficulty, tie their hands at no very distant date, and be a bar to all further progress. They might fairly look forward to the time when more would be demanded in the way of temperance reform than was now demanded and therefore they ought to see that this compensation fund should be an assistance and not a hindrance. At present he was not satisfied that the Inland Revenue would be able to arrive at what was the moral and equitable value of a licensed house before the passing of this Bill, and he therefore appealed to the Solicitor-General to throw some light on this matter, and make it clear, in order that the Committee might know how far it was going.

*Mr. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe) Expressed the opinion that this Amendment went to the heart of the whole question. It had been pointed out by the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, and still more forcibly by the hon. Member for Blackpool on the Second Reading of the Bill, that by providing a compensation fund they would at any rate liberate the hands of the licensing justices and free them from the natural reluctance they now felt to take away a licence without compensating the holder. He might be allowed to remind the Committee of some figures where the action of the magistrates in reducing licences to the great benefit of the community had taken place. This had taken place in districts where the evil had been forced upon the attention of the magistrates. In Liverpool 350 licences had been taken away in thirteen years, with the result that the arrests for drunkenness had decreased from 16,000 to 4,000. They had been able to dispense with the services of 100 policemen, and the moral condition of that town had been wonderfully improved in spite of the large and growing population. In Blackburn the number of licences had been reduced in fifteen years from 600 to 417, while the proceedings against licensees had diminished from thirty-nine to seven, and the arrests for drunkenness and disorder from 989 to 624 per annum.

*The CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is now dealing with the general question. I must ask him to confine his remarks to the Amendment before the Committee.

*Mr. TOMKINSON said he was endeavouring to show that some time limit ought to be imposed, and that the compensation fund would be altogether inadequate to effect even such a reduction as had been made under existing circumstances. In Winchester there was one licence to every 150 people. The licensing magistrates gave the brewers one year in which to submit a plan for reduction. They agreed to surrender fifty licences without any compensation, but after the speech of the Prime Minister they withdrew the offer, and now every one of those licences would have to be paid for on the basis of this Bill. He submitted that, unless a time limit were imposed, the efforts of temperance reformers for more than fifty years would be frustrated, and the trammels of the drink traffic more firmly fixed upon the backs of the people.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said that if, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Somersetshire had stated, it was essential that this clause should be fully discussed in order that the Committee might know where they stood, with regard to the principle of compensation, it was a pity the whole afternoon should have been spent in discussing a question which had already been debated for two days and voted upon by the Committee. With regard to the words "calculated as if this Act had not passed," the right hon. Gentleman had asked how anybody would be able to calculate, some years hence, the value of a business at the time this Bill passed, taking into consideration the conduct and everything else connected with the person carrying it on. The words had no application at all to the valuation in that sense. It was contended that the Bill would give a permanent or, at all events a statutory term to the licensee. The words meant that in the valuation no such permanency should be taken into account, but that, when the Commissioners came to fix the value of a licence or the value of premises for the purposes of the clause, they should consider the value having regard to the fact that the renewal of the licence was subject to the absolute discretion of the magistrates, and that the holder of the licence had only just such a tenure as he at present possessed. If there was any doubt as to the exact meaning of the words, he was prepared to insert "as if the licence were subject to the same conditions of renewal as were applicable immediately before the passing of this Act," or he would consider any other form of words that might be submitted before the Report stage. He hoped the Committee would now come to a decision on the question as there were a number of other Amendments which he would be glad to hear discussed.

AN HON. MEMBER: Then why do you not extend the time?

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield) said the meaning of the clause had not yet been made perfectly clear. If no agreement were come to and the matter went to arbitration, the question would be left to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who based their valuations on the takings of the houses.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: That is not so.

MR. MARKHAM said he was basing his remarks on the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries, and he would be glad to know upon what other basis than that of the takings of the house the Commissioners could arrive at a value. He should not support the Amendment, because he failed to see how anybody could vote for it who was opposed altogether to the principle of compensation.

Question put.

*MR. BLACK (Banffshire) said the Amendment which stood in his name on the Paper would, he hoped, not be considered as marring the Bill, because it was in entire accordance with its principle, and provided that where a licence was forfeited for public purposes the compensation should be paid by the trade. Unless this Amendment was inserted in the Bill, the net result would be that public improvements would be greatly hindered, because undoubtedly the result of the measure would be to very largely increase the amount of compensation which, but for the Amendment, would be required to be paid by the public authority if the licence were forfeited for any purpose of public improvement or utility. In several respects the monopoly value of the licence would be enhanced by the passing of this measure. First of all there would be an increased value vested in the licence by legitimate increase, in consequence of the payment of contributions and diminution in other licences under this Act. First of all there would be fixity of tenure proposed by this measure which was estimated to increase the value by three or four times. Then there was the increase in value which accrued by increased population, and non-granting of new licences, but there would also be increases in monopoly value which might be termed illegitimate. There would also be the increment through forfeiture of other licences by non-observance of the terms of the licence granted. Further there would be the withdrawal of reasonable pressure brought to bear on licence-holders by the licensing authorities. For instance, he was informed that out of forty-six licences withdrawn in Glasgow by the operation of the public authority, only four received any compensation, because the magistrates were enabled by the reasonable pressure they brought to bear on the licence-holders to dispense with the licences without compensation. If a public authority in any future time required to suppress licences, they would require, according to the proposals of the Bill, to pay the increased monopoly value of those licences. He further submitted the Amendment was reasonable because in making a public grant of a monopoly to a trade—as they did in this case—it was reasonable that they should do so subject to the public uses. The obligation to pay compensation on the part of the trade was stronger in this case than where a licence was taken away on the ground of non-requirement, because in the case he was figuring the licence which had been removed would be a valuable licence, and not one which was not required. The result would consequently be that the trade — unless the Amendment were accepted—would get the full increment in the shape of largely increased trade without any payment on its part. The Government were between two masters, one being the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—who really made the suggestion to which his Amendment gave effect —and the other the brewing interest. It would be interesting to see which master the Government would serve.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 28, after the word 'Act,' to insert the words 'or where licensed premises are required for purposes of public utility or improvement.'"—(Mr. Black.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's) said the clause only applied to licences taken away for a particular purpose. What the hon. Member proposed was that if it was necessary to take a licence away for the purposes of a public improvement, it should come under the provisions of this Bill. Surely that was entirely reversing the practice which now prevailed, which was that if property was taken away for the purposes of public improvements compensation should be given under the Lands Clauses Act. He could not see why if a house was taken away, and the licence forfeited for the purposes of a public improvement, compensation should come out of the fund provided for by this Bill.

*MR. BLACK said that in deference to the opinion expressed by his hon. friends around him he did not propose to divide the House. He asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEELY moved an Amendment defining the amount of compensation to be paid to different persons who were interested in a licensed house. Under the proposals of the Government that was left to be decided by quarter sessions. It would be felt by many persons, and very largely by those who were interested in these houses, that it would be an advantage if the House were to define the amounts that were to be paid to the different persons concerned, both because the question was one of very great importance, and also because the compensation under the Bill was for an act of a public kind different in character from the usual acts for which compensation was paid. If an ordinary property was taken for a railway or a public improvement the persons dispossessed, although debarred from carrying on their business at a particular place, were not prevented from commencing again in a neighbouring place. But under the Bill if a public-house was closed there would be no opportunity for a man, once dispossessed of his licence, carrying on business in a neighbouring street because the very intention of the Act was to diminish the number of licences. Therefore the publican was subjected to a kind of inconvenience and loss which the ordinary person whose business was taken away in consequence of a public improvement was not generally subjected to. It was consequently necessary to carefully define the particular amounts which were to be paid and the manner in which it was proposed to distribute them.

First of all, he proposed that those who were employed in or about licensed premises should be paid three months wages or salary. This was to meet the case of tenants, managers, and other persons employed in these houses who, if there was a general reduction of licences as the Prime Minister suggested, would be seriously injured in consequence of the difficulty of obtaining employment in their own business. Then he proposed that the occupier of the premises, i.e., the tenant, should have a sum equal to two years profits, calculated on the average of the last five years and also the difference between the value of the stock and fittings in the premises as valued between the ingoing and outgoing tenant. He also proposed to give to the licence-holder a definite right, which he did not feel at all certain he would have under the Bill, of compensation for the loss of his stock. There were many licence-holders the greater part of whose capital was invested in the stock and fittings of their respective houses, and if their licences were taken away, they would be injured by being obliged to sell, and further by the fact that a reduction in the number of houses would lead to a corresponding reduction in the demand for stock. He did not see anything in the Bill to enable quarter sessions to make an allowance of that kind to the occupier, and it was therefore well to insert a definite proposal in the Bill. Then he proposed that the owner of the premises should have the cost of any structural alteration necessary to adapt the premises to other uses than the sale of intoxicating liquors; and further, that up to 1914 there should be paid in addition to the compensation mentioned to the owner of the premises a sum equal to the average annual profits as above, multiplied by the number of years unexpired between the date of the refusal of the licence and 31st December, 1914.

The Prime Minister had stated that he could not understand the argument in favour of the time limit; but the right hon. Gentleman must acknowledge that the feeling in favour of it was strong in the country and that there must be some basis for some arrangement of that kind. The proposal which he made would, he believed, meet the difficulty, and be just to the publican, while it would not cause any injustice to others concerned in the trade. What was at the bottom of the feeling was that the value of a licensed house was altogether different from the value of other businesses. The goodwill of an ordinary business was due to the energy and good management of the owner or to the particular position of the house, but the goodwill of a licensed house had, in addition, a value due to the monopoly given to it by the State. That was worth twelve or thirteen years purchase, while the ordinary goodwill of an ordinary business was worth only two or three years purchase. Everyone acknowledged that the growth of the monopoly value had been a misfortune and a mistake and it would be far better if the country could obtain that value for itself. What he proposed was that they should give an absolute right to the owner of a licensed house, till 1914. that no licence should be granted within a certain distance of his house and that during those ten years he would continue to have his monopoly value. If they did that they could at the end of that time quite reasonably and justly treat his licence as a new one, put it on the seven years system proposed for new licences, and obtain the monopoly for the public generally, instead of for individual owners. He was not bound to the terms of the distribution of the compensation embodied in his Amendment, and only put them forward as a basis for compromise. He begged to move.

"In page 1, line 28, to leave out from from the word 'Act' to the end of Sub-section (1), and insert the words 'the following sums shall be paid as compensation to the persons concerned.

'(a) To all persons employed in or about the licensed premises in conection with the sale of intoxicating liquors, three months wages or salary;

'(b) To the occupier of the said premises, a sum equal to two years profits calculated on the average of the last five years, and also the difference between the value of the stock and fittings in the premises, as valued between an ingoing and outgoing tenant and their value for removal and sale;

'(c) To the owner of the said premises, the cost of any structural alterations necessary to adapt the premises to other uses than the sale of intoxicating liquors, such amount not to exceed two years annual value;

'(d) If the renewal be refused before the thirty-first day of December, 1914, then there shall be paid in addition to compensation as above to the owner of the said premises a sum equal to the average annual profits calculated as above multiplied by the number of years unexpired between the date of the refusal of the licence and the thirty-first day of December, 1914.' "—(Mr. Seely.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'a sum' stand part of the clause."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said it was impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment. Grave injustice would be done if the compensation was distributed on the basis proposed. The occupier of the premises was to get exactly the same amount of compensation, whether he was merely the manager or the holder of the substantial interest of a lease. It was perfectly evident that that could not be just. All the owner was to get was the sum necessary to structurally alter the premises for the carrying on of another business, without relieving him of the covenants into which he might have entered by reason of the premises being licensed. That really was no compensation at all. The hon. Gentleman had asked him whether the holder of the licence would be allowed for fittings under the scheme of compensation proposed in the Amendment of the Home Secretary. It was a little out of place to discuss that proposal now, but as they might not come to that Amendment—[HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.] Everybody knew that the Amendment might not be reached.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): So did the Government when they framed the guillotine.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that if the Amendment were not reached, it would be due to the protracted discussions on the first clause of the Bill. But his answer to the question was that the whole question of the loss sustained by the holder by reason of his being deprived of his licence would be taken into account.

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.) said that this was the proper occasion, and the only occasion, for the discussion of the important question as to how the compensation money was to be distributed among the various persons entitled to share in it. The Solicitor-General had referred to the Home Secretary's Amendment ten pages lower down, and had reproached them for occupying time on other Amendments. But the useful discussions that afternoon had been initiated by Members sitting on the Government Benches. Therefore it was not judicious for the Solicitor-General to have raised such an issue. This was the only opportunity that would be available for placing what was a real grievance before the House and the country. The very fact that the Home Secretary had put down an Amendment, which would never be reached for discussion, showed that the Bill as it stood was inequitable, or at least did not provide an equitable solution of the problem of the distribution of the compensation. It was quite clear that as the Bill was framed the only person who would receive anything, in the vast majority of cases, would be the brewer, and not the person actually engaged in the business. The Government had awakened to the fact that their proposal would not bear examination, or might have unpleasant results outside, and so they had tardily put down an Amendment, in the name of the Home Secretary, which proposed to add at the end of Sub-section 2—

> "Having regard in the case of the licence-holder not only to his legal interest in the premises but also to his conduct and to the length of time during which the has been the holder of the licence, and the holder of a licence shall (notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary) in no case receive a less amount than he would be entitled to as tenant for a year, or from year to year, of the licensed premises."

He had not the least notion how a valuer was going to work in order to find out what was the amount to which a man was entitled as tenant for a year or from year to year, which was a totally different thing, but in some way or other, by some oblique process of reasoning, his conduct was to come into question in determining the true scale of remuneration. He could only say, as a practical man, that the wording of the section was too obscure to be worthy of any consideration.

They, therefore, came back to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Lincoln. He could not pledge himself to support all the proposals of the hon. Member's Amendment, but he hoped that it might become a substantive question in order that the Committee might be enabled to deal with the whole question of the distribution of the compensation fund. But there were one or two features about the Amendment which deserved the sympathetic consideration of the House. In the first place it singled out as deserving of a share, at any rate, in the fund not merely the owner and occupier, but the persons employed in the business and who obtained their livelihood by a continuance of the licence. For his part he could not regard any scheme of compensation as satisfying the necessities of the case which left unprovided for those persons who were pursuing a perfectly honourable calling and who found their means of livelihood suddenly put an end to through the operation of the Bill. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would affirm that the employés of the licence-holder had an equitable title to a share in the fund. The hon. Member then distinguished between the case of the owner and the occupier. It was absolutely essential, if justice was to be done in this matter, that the occupier should have a first charge on the fund. It was not the great brewers that would suffer from the suppression of licences; on the contrary, in many instances they would positively gain from their reduction. On the other hand, the individual publican, whatever be his legal status, whether tenant, manager, agent, or trader by commission, was the man actually carrying on the business and was the first person to suffer if it was suppressed. Both in respect of the occupier and the owner the Amendment of the hon. Member proposed to limit the amount of compensation on a rational and satisfactory basis. But the Government having put down an Amendment in a place on the Paper where it would never be reached, which it was impossible to construe and difficult to understand, and the hon. Member having at this stage put down in plain language a proposition which everyone could follow, this was the appropriate moment to discuss the whole question.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that the right hon. Gentleman apparently desired to discuss the whole question now. But it should be observed that the whole question had not been gone into by the mover of the Amendment. Personally he had not the least objection at the first moment to discuss the subject in its entirety, for he thought that the right hon. Gentleman would acquit him of any desire to shirk the discussion of any point that might arise on the Bill.

MR. ASQUITH pointed out that the Government was appealing to the Committee to discuss the question under conditions which made it impossible to do so adequately.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that the moment the right hon. Gentleman was disposed to issue a challenge on the issue he should be prepared to deal with the question. The right hon. Gentleman, moreover, was absolutely wrong when he said that after some hesitation the Government had at length put down the Amendment giving a portion of the compensation fund to the manager. On the first day in Committee he stated that the opinion of the Government was that any holder of a licence, manager or otherwise, was a person interested in the licensed premises; and when the hon. Member for Leeds challenged that opinion he had stated that if it were not so he was prepared to put down an Amendment to make the point perfectly clear. The Government were now told that in putting this Amendment on the Paper, they had placed it there with some ulterior motive, and because they had been driven to do so by persons who were largely interested in public-houses. Such a view came very well from those who had constituted themselves the champions of these managers, from those who had in the first instance tried to destroy all their interests, who had tried to make the various persons interested strangle each other. This new-born enthusiasm for the persons who were engaged in the public-house business was as amusing as it was amazing. The Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman had ridiculed ran as follows—

> "Having regard in the case of the licence-holder not only to his legal interest in the premises but also to his conduct and to the length of time during which he has been the holder of the licence, and the holder of a licence shall (notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary) in no case receive a less amount than he would be entitled to as tenant for a year, or from year to year, of the licensed premises."

Those words, which seemed to be strangely unfamiliar to the right hon. Gentleman, were taken from the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which contained a special provision for persons holding a tenancy from year to year. As a matter of practice many tenants of licensed houses held an agreement for three months; some were managers, and some were weekly, some monthly, and some three or six monthly tenants. Although these agreements were short, they had continued in many cases for a considerable time. The Government had therefore said that it was fair in these cases, although the terms of agreement were short, for the holder of the licence to get at least the share of the compensation which a tenant from year to year would get. It was an advantage to make it clear that the person who held a weekly, monthly, or three-monthly tenure should receive an amount of compensation measured at least according to the same scale as if he held a tenancy durable from year to year. That was a very great benefit to these men. He saw no difficulty in having regard "not only to his legal interest in the premises, but also to his conduct and to the length of time during which he had been the holder of the licence." The man who held on a short agreement, continued year after year and renewed from time to time, had the same kind of equitable expectation as the owner of the house had in relation to the licence for which compensation was being set up under the Bill. That being so, just as the claim to compensation was set up in consequence of the equitable expectation that the owner had, so this man who had been in that employment under a short agreement, ought to have his right recognised by quarter sessions. And why should the right hon. Gentleman throw ridicule upon the consideration of his conduct? Was it not well that the man who had conducted a house well should get more compensation?

MR. EMMOTT (Oldham): But why should the brewer get less under those circumstances?

Sir Edward Carson.

SIR EDWARD CARSON replied that it was a matter of extreme importance to the brewer that the premises should be well conducted, otherwise he might lose the licence altogether. The Government endeavoured to put a premium upon the good conduct of the house, believing that the person who was in possession should have that inducement to carry on the premises properly. The bad conduct of a house might deprive the owner of a great deal of compensation, and it was not an unfair provision that if the licensee had conducted it well he should receive a larger amount of compensation. They had endeavoured to put a premium upon the good conduct of the house, and to do what was just and equitable as between the different parties.

*MR. J. H. LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said the Solicitor-General stated that he had dealt with all the main points raised during the discussion. But in the course of the two speeches he had delivered he had not made the slightest allusion to that part of the Amendment which provided that compensation should be paid—

"(a) To all persons employed in or about the licensed premises in connection with the sale of intoxicating liquors, three months wages or salary."

He knew the case of a brewer who had received in licences from the public a monopoly value to the extent of £100,000, and they were now asked to compensate him to the fullest possible extent for any licence taken away for public purposes. The persons employed in those licensed premises had as great a moral right to share in the compensation fund as the brewer. The Prime Minister asked them to consider the broad equities of this case. He thought this Bill stood on very narrow grounds if it excluded from its equities all those persons employed in connection with licensed premises, many of whom had spent practically the whole of their lives, working long hours. The broad equities of the case demanded that those people should receive that fair treatment which the Bill did not give them. The Solicitor-General said it was impossible to accept this Amendment because the whole Bill was based upon depreciation of property. He commended that statement to the notice of the Committee, because they had always been told that there were great questions of morality involved. Now the reason given was depreciation of property, and personal claims were entirely ignored. He wished to draw the Solicitor-General's attention to an Amendment on page 35 in the name of the Home Secretary which was as follows—

> "In page 2, line 10, at end, to insert the words 'having regard in the case of the licence-holder not only to his legal interest in the premises but also to his conduct and to the length of time during which he has been the holder of the licence, and the holder of a licence shall (notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary) in no case receive a less amount than he would be entitled to as tenant for a year, or from year to year of the licensed premises.'"

He could quite understand that a licence-holder under very short notice was going under this Amendment to receive not less than twelve months compensation, but what he wished to know was whether a tenant who might be entitled to a longer period than one year could contract himself out of this Amendment in respect of that longer period? If he could contract himself out of it then the position was that a man under a week's notice who had been there for only a few weeks or months was entitled to exactly the same compensation as the man who had been there for twenty or twenty-five years and whose conduct was irreproachable. Was it possible for the latter individual to contract himself out of his rights or, in the words of the parable of the vineyard, was the man who had worked one hour entitled to one penny and the man who had worked twelve hours only entitled to the same amount?

SIR EDWARD CARSON said there were many considerations which hung together in regard to this matter. He did not know whether, for instance, the hon. Member meant to say that no lessee was to be allowed to contract himself out; if so, that was the intention of the Government. It was absurd to lay down that a man who was going to take a lease of his premises should not enter into any contract he pleased. The men they had to protect were those men who had short tenancies who were really in the nature of employees or managers and not lessees at all. They had proposed an enactment that, notwithstanding any contract entered into, they were to get at least one year's compensation.

*MR. J. H. LEWIS said the reply of the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly clear and they now knew that these men who had been tenants of licensed premises for a very long period of years were to be free to contract themselves out of the benefits of this clause.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said they had no such power, as there was no compulsion put upon those men.

*MR. J. H. LEWIS said he was referring to agreements made between landlord and tenant.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: Agreements for how long?

*MR. J. H. LEWIS said he meant from year to year. In future, in every case of agreements made between landlord and tenant, there would be a provision contracting them out of the interest they had in the licence. They were proposing to give to the man who had been in the house a few weeks the same compensation as the respectable and responsible tenant of irreproachable character, who had been in the business for twenty-five or thirty years. What equity was there in that? He had an Amendment on the Paper which he ventured to think met this case fully. It was on page 27—

> "In page 2, line 2, after the word 'shall' to insert the words 'after making equitable provision for the licence-holder and the persons usually employed in or about the licensed premises.'"

He asked the Government whether that was not a fair and equitable way of dealing with this question. When the meaning of the Government Amendment was fully realised, the people of this country would be more amazed than ever at the extraordinary inconsistencies of the Bill which they were now, under unfair limitations of time, endeavouring to discuss.

And, it being half-past Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this evening.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2:—

Amendment again proposed.

"In page 1, line 28, to leave out from the word 'Act,' to the end of Sub-section (1), and insert the words 'the following sums shall be paid as compensation to the persons concerned:—

'(a) To all persons employed in or about the licensed premises in connection with the sale of intoxicating liquors, three months wages or salary.

'(b) To the occupier of the said premises, a sum equal to two years profits calculated on the average of the last five years, and also the difference between the value of the stock and fittings in the premises, as valued between an ingoing and outgoing tenant and their value for removal and sale.

'(c) To the owner of the said premises, the cost of any structural alterations necessary to adapt the premises to other uses than the sale of intoxicating liquors, such amount not to exceed two years annual value.

'(d) If the renewal be refused before the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, then there shall be paid in addition to compensation as above to the owner of the said premises a sum equal to the average annual profits, calculated as above multiplied by the number of years unexpired between the date of the refusal of the licence and the thirty-first day of December one thousand nine hundred and fourteen.'"—(Mr. Seely.)

Question again proposed, "That the words 'a sum' stand part of the clause."

MR. EDWARDS (Radnor) said the Solicitor-General had been twitting the right hon. and learned Member for Fife with his new-found enthusiasm for the trade. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to be jealous of his right hon. friend's criticisms, as if he were poaching on his preserves, and wished to convey to the House the idea that "Codlin was the friend and not Short." It was time that his right hon. friend did show some enthusiasm, and he (Mr. Edwards) apprehended he was showing an enthusiasm which they all felt, and that was enthusiasm for justice, and inasmuch as he said the Bill did not do justice he protested against it, and supported the Amendment with enthusiasm, because it would do justice to a particular section of the trade. They had discussed the question of the amount to be given, and the time within which such compensation should be granted. Now the question was to whom should this compensation be paid? He himself thought there could be but one real act of justice, and that was to let compensation go in the direction proposed by the Amendment. He knew that brewers had great expectations under this Bill, but it would be fair that these expectations to some extent should be lessened. The publicans ought to have a larger share of compensation than the Bill proposed. Practically it gave most compensation to the brewers. That was an injustice, because they took most of the profits. They took profits as manufacturers, and also on the sale of beer, but the publican had only one. The tenant, according to the Bill, was to find the compensation money, and under these circumstances the least they could do was to give him a proper and fair compensation when he was dispossessed of his licence. The theory was that the more licences there were reduced the more was the value of the remaining houses increased. If that were so, the more would they be increasing the brewers' profits by reducing the houses. He had received a letter from a tenant who felt his position very keenly. He wrote—

"The Government Licensing Bill appears to me to be a brewers' Bill and nothing more. It appears to be for their benefit solely, and leaves the unfortunate tenant to look after himself. If I read the Bill aright, the tenant is to find the money for the purchase of a licence, and if someone in the House of Commons would find what benefit the tenant would get from his outlay, he would confer a benefit upon many licence-holders."

It was said that the tied houses numbered about 80 per cent. in the country. If that were so it was a serious matter, because a large number of tenants would get no compensation. That fact made him anxious to support the Amendment. There were in three small towns in his own county forty-six public-houses. Half of them were tied houses, and, therefore, 50 per cent. of the tenants would not, under this Bill, get substantial justice, unless the Amendment were agreed to. The hon. Member for Flint Boroughs had referred to the fact that the brewers might get the tenants to contract out the benefits of the Bill as regarded compensation. They knew enough to imagine what the position of that tenant would be who refused to agree to what the owner or brewer wanted him to do. His position would not be a pleasant one.

*Dr. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) said he regarded with great interest the Amendment of the hon. Member for Lincoln which, amongst other things, suggested that the employees should receive three months salary, for the reason that he had himself put down an Amendment, the object of which was to include in the persons to receive compensation the employees. He need not labour the point. The calling was an arduous and exacting one, honourably carried out, and the employees were almost always overworked and frequently underpaid. He had listened to the Solicitor-General, who had made two speeches, which he said completely covered all the points of the Amendment and the speeches made in regard to it; but it was rather significant that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not mention one word about the employees. There was a grim significance about that omission which ought not to be lost on the working classes. The Government at the last general election posed as the friend of the working classes. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham, speaking on the 19th September, 1900, in the middle of the election, asked to whom the working classes of this country owed all the legislation which benefited their condition, and said they would find it was the Unionist Party at the election; and that statement appeared in an exaggerated form in every Tory pamphlet. That being so, he was entitled to ask now what the Government were going to do with regard to the employees. On this occasion deeds and not words were wanted. The Solicitor-General was good enough to say that the basis of compensation in each case was the depreciation of property. The employee's property was his labour, which was not only depreciated but wiped out of existence when the house was shut up. The working classes of this country were very happy-go-lucky and looked to their own interests last of all, but he believed the limit of human endurance had been reached, and that the working classes of this country, when the opportunity, now long denied, was given to them, would mete out to the Government the treatment the Government were now meting out to them.

*Mr. J. A. PEASE (Essex, Saffron Walden) said the excuse put forward by the Government for this Bill was that it would reduce the number of licences. The Committee knew from the speeches delivered in the country and on behalf of the Bill, such as the speech of the hon. Member for Ripon on the Second Reading, that the reason why licences had not been reduced up to the present was not because of any particular hardship from the point of view of the brewers but from the point of view of the tenant. Over and over again they had been told that it was the tenant who ought to be compensated, and it was because of the gross hardships inflicted on the tenant that the magistrates had not taken advantage of their power to reduce licences under the existing law. This Bill now almost entirely sacrificed the tenant and handed over the compensation to the brewer landlord. The licensee was a person selected for his good character and his knowledge of the business: and if he were dispossessed he would have great difficulty in following another calling at the moment. Therefore if he was to be dismissed he should receive a large compensation under this Bill. The Solicitor-General had said that under this Bill he would receive compensation. That was not plain from the Bill; but, even if it were so, the compensation to be received by him seemed to be most inadequate. He ought to receive not only compensation for goodwill but for everything he put into the business.

Sir EDWARD CARSON: Not good will.

*Mr. J. A. PEASE said he was certainly under the impression that the Home Secretary said that the man should be compensated for his goodwill, and the right hon. Gentleman instanced the case of a popular cricketer who took a house and drew together a large custom, and said he should certainly be compensated for his goodwill. He thought the Government were bound to secure to the tenant this goodwill in the event of his being dispossessed. In the debate on the Second Reading of the Bill, the Colonial Secretary said he was in favour of compensation being paid on similar lines to that paid under the Compensation for Accidents Act. In a case of this kind he thought they were justified in giving compensation to the publican who was dispossessed of his licence through no fault of his own. The Colonial Secretary said under the Compensation Act three years salary would be paid to the representatives of a man who through accident was disabled. His Amendment which appeared on the Notice Paper suggested two years salary to the dispossessed tenant. The belated proposal of the Government would only give one year, and nothing to the dispossessed staff whatever. His complaint against the Government was that they had looked after the interest of the brewer instead of looking after the interest of the publican and his staff. He should like to see an Amendment introduced which would give to the staff not less than three months salary. In many cases six months salary would be more suitable. He did not suppose that in this case the Committee would hear any speeches from the hon. Member for Salford or the hon. Member for South Derbyshire. They knew very well that the Government had voiced their views in the debate. Hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House who had supported the principle of compensation would vote in favour of this Amendment with a great deal of pleasure, believing that it was due to the workers connected with the trade.

Mr. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said there was a provision included in sub-clause (a) which was really the logical sequence of the Amendment the Home Secretary had put down. He asked the Government to reconsider at some future stage the question raised by the Amendment in order to see whether they could not make this concession on behalf of the employees. This case differed from the ordinary compensation case. In the case of a grocer's shop taken for public purposes a person employed in the shop might be subject to a month's notice, and it would be absurd to give him three months compensation for disturbance. The grocer could remove elsewhere and open a shop and continue to give employment to the shopman, but a publican whose licence was not renewed could not do that. The employees of the publican were thrown on the market as unemployed, and he thought their case might receive a little consideration from the Government. He suggested that they should consider the question between now and the Report stage.

Mr. ROBSON (South Shields) said he desired to express his agreement with the arguments used on the Opposition side of the House on the question of compensation, but they did not in any way overstate the importance of the Amendment. The Amendment put down by the Government was a perfectly futile one. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Lincoln would at least secure some share of the compensation fund not only to the barman but also to the publican. The Amendment put down by the Government would not secure more than a nominal share of the fund to the publican, because the Government Amendment only operated in default of agreement. The Government Amendment was that if the parties agreed to a sum by way of compensation then that should be the sum awarded by quarter sessions. What did that mean? It meant the right of contracting out.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said there was another Amendment dealing with default of agreement on the Paper.

Mr. ROBSON replied that that was the Amendment he was going to deal with. On page 31 there was an Amendment striking out the words "in default of agreement," and substituting other words. He would undertake to say that that Amendment was merely one of drafting except in the particular that the agreement to be arrived at by the parties was to be subject to the approval of quarter sessions. He rather imagined quarter sessions would be apt to take the view of the Solicitor-General and say that where the publican and the brewer had come to an agreement under which the amount of compensation was to be paid to the publican it should be nothing more than nominal. They were free contracting parties; they were not Chinese labourers. [AN HON. MEMBER: They might be.] Quarter sessions would say, "What is there in the Bill to compel us to interfere with a free and voluntary contract entered into to reduce the amount of compensation to a mere nominal sum?" There was nothing in the Government Amendment to prevent it. That being so, one had the right to test the situation by the general argument used by the Solicitor-General in favour of the Bill.

The Law Officer of the Crown was all for free contract when they were trying to secure a share of compensation for the barman. What was a licence itself but a free contract for a year? A licence was a permission given by authority to the publican to open his public-house for a year, and he was expected to fulfil his obligation for that licence. It was a contract between him and the authorities. Why was the free contract to be sét aside? The claim of the licence-holder was founded upon a legitimate expectation of renewal of the licence. That was the foundation for the equity on which the Bill was based. But what about the barman? It was true that the barman might be in receipt of a weekly wage, but had he not a legitimate expectation. It was impossible when they left the sphere of free contract, as they did in the Bill, to distinguish logically and legitimately between landlord, tenant, and barman. Once they came to this element of expectation as the groundwork for statutory compensation, there was not any one of these three parties who was not equally entitled to be considered along with the other. Could it be said that they were being considered equally? The barman was omitted altogether, and the publican was having the substantiality of his position put at the mercy of an agreement. Were there any kind of limits except the approval of quarter sessions to that agreement? None. They knew what that would amount to. The Solicitor-General said that where a man had been a long time in the service, and had shown good conduct, that ought to be taken into consideration by quarter sessions. But what was there to prevent the landlord from giving notice as soon as he thought that compensation was likely to come into the question. There was nothing to prevent him from changing his barman or tenant, and quarter sessions had no power go into that Therefore the power of quarter sessions was a sham. It was one of those illusory provisions of which this Government was so fond in all their measures—intended not for actual working, but for election meetings.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich) said the Government had not made it clear what they intended to do to help these men, though throughout the debate sympathy had been expressed with them. There was an Amendment stating in legal language what was to be done, but the people who would have to deal with these matters would fail to understand what the Solicitor-General really wanted to do. Workmen had had a large experience of Acts of Parliament passed in their interest, but when it came to interpretation they got several learned gentlemen arguing different ways. Several hours had been spent lately in arguing whether a well 200 feet deep was a building thirty feet high. Could they not put into the Bill something in ordinary or "garden" language by which a man could understand whether he was to get compensation or not? When the Solicitor-General was cross-examining the mover of the Amendment, how was any small man to understand if he was to get compensation under this Bill? He himself could put it into Whitechapel-English, but the average man did not possess a cultivated intelligence, and he had heard many things in the House which he did not profess to understand. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the sole interest of the Government was, by this Bill, to promote the well-being of the community; that it was a great temperance measure; that it was going to shut up many nuisances; that, if two houses out of five were shut, it would be an advantage to the other three in the trade; and that the Bill was to be a great reform. But when they abolished vestries and school boards it was put in the Bill that every man who lost his situation was to be adequately compensated. Of course, that was an arrangement for the professional class, but it was quite different in the case of the average working man. It was all right in the case of a man that could be dubbed "John Brown, Esquire." He himself had been dubbed "Esquire"; but it was not very good stuff to feed children on—not very fattening or comforting.

He wanted to ask Gentlemen in the House who were really interested in the Bill in a general way—not personally or financially interested — whether they would persuade the Government to frame a clause to give compensation to these poor men. They said to these poor men, "Believe me, we are with you; and we want to give you compensation." Sympathy was very cheap, but it ought not to be beyond the wit of the Government to frame a clause to give compensation to these poor men. If the licence-holder was simply the servant of a brewery or distillery company and never went into the house, the business being conducted by a manager, the former would not expect to get anything, and the latter would not have a legal claim. Would the Government insert a clause providing that, where there were no persons financially interested in the licence, there should be a corresponding reduction in the amount of compensation to be awarded for that particular house. He knew scores of publicans who would not get a penny under this Bill, not even if the Home Secretary's Amendment was carried. He contended that this Bill would be a positive injury to the manager or licence-holder, and that it would not effect the reforms which it was claimed it would effect unless a good many of the Amendments on the Paper were adopted. But in an hour hon. Members would be ordered out of the House as in licensed premises by someone getting up and saying, "Time, please." That was the way they were now doing the nation's business. He pleaded in the interests of these poor men and barmaids in the tied houses who were the slaves of the brewers, and who, when the house was shut up, would find it difficult to turn their hands to anything else.

Mr. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) said that a whole evening of Parliamentary time would not be more than adequate to discuss this Amendment. The Committee had not had before them a full explanation of the proposals of the Government in regard to the distribution of the amount of compensation. The basis for claiming compensation under the Bill was that the person must be interested in the licensed premises. Whatever words might be added at the end of Sub-section 2 would be governed by the consideration that the foundation of the title to compensation was interest in the licensed premises. Regard ought to be had, not merely to the persons interested in the premises, but to those interested in the trade conducted on the premises. In the first place there were those who were employed on the premises. It was quite clear that they were not interested in the licensed premises. In the next place there was the occupier of the premises, who was not always the licence-holder, and he would not be entitled to any compensation under the Bill. The classes whose interests were most carefully and minutely safeguarded by the Bill were the owners of the premises, the lessees, or the mortgagees. Unless the Amendment was adopted, the other classes he had referred to would suffer hardship, and receive no compensation. In many cases the occupier would get nothing under the Bill. The licence-holder was often not the occupier at all, but the nominee or secretary of a brewery company. Under the suggested Amendment of the Home Secretary compensation was to be given, "having regard in the case of the licence-holder not only to his legal interest in the premises, etc." Now in such a case the occupier had no legal interest in the premises at all, while the licence-holder had his salary from the brewery company. He observed that the activity of hon. Gentlemen opposite increased as the time when the guillotine was to drop approached. He only wished to point out that the words proposed by the Government would be entirely futile to carry out the object they said they had in view. The persons who would suffer most if a licence were not renewed were not the brewers, or even the licence-holders, but the persons who were employed. He thought, therefore, that the Government should adopt some such Amendment as had been proposed.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) said he was personally somewhat disappointed that the Committee had not heard from the Government that they were prepared to introduce an Amendment which would give effect, in part, to the Amendment moved by his hon. friend. He had always held that, when anything was taken away for the public good, the person from whom it was taken should receive adequate compensation. If it were conceded that the number of public-houses should be reduced, then everyone who suffered by such reduction should be compensated. That view was now entertained by hon. Gentlemen opposite; and he was very glad that they had been converted to it. He hoped that when they were in office they would bear in mind the precept they had laid down in connection with the Amendment. He would strongly urge on the Government the desirability of taking into consideration the employees of public-houses that might be suppressed. He fully realised that the brewers would have to pay a large sum towards compensation; he believed it was the brewer, and not the publican, who would pay; and, therefore, the brewer would naturally have the first claim to the compensation. But, at the same time, it would be just, it would ease the passage of the Bill, if it were arranged that the employees should receive a share of the compensation. It might be said that it would be ridiculous to compensate a man who might only have been engaged a week; but, even in that case, he might have had to move his furniture and incur expense; and he should therefore be compensated. Employees in public-houses would not be able to secure other employment at a moment's notice; and, perhaps in a single day, a large number of barmaids and barmen would be thrown out of employment. Therefore, he sincerely trusted that the employees would receive compensation.

SIR ROBERT REID said he had always thought that the Conservative Party would have reason to repent of the principles on which this Bill was based. The fifty minutes still remaining were inadequate for the discussion even of this Amendment. Expectation had been made the ground for compensation, and now they had a multitude of people coming forward to share in this compensation. According to the Bill, all the compensation belonged solely to the owner of the house, who in most cases was the brewer, for whose benefit the Bill was introduced. Now the Government had put down an Amendment to provide that the tenant should have compensation. The next class put forward, and by no means the last—he did not see why the commercial traveller who called at the house was not equally entitled to compensation—the next class was the servants, the barmen and barmaids. He saw no reason why they should not be compensated. The Bill left it uncertain whether the profits were to be bought and paid for or not, and whether the profits were to be merely the profits of the retail business on the premises or were to include the brewers profits. The Government's proposed Amendment did not settle these points. The Bill provided that the compensation was to be calculated as if the Bill had not become law. That was the language appropriate to what was known as the "sterilisation" clause, but how was it applicable to a Bill to be operative ten, twenty, forty, fifty, sixty, seventy years hence? It was drawing language from one statute and placing it in a Bill without any real, adequate appreciation of what its effect was on that Bill. The Solicitor-General had offered to make an Amendment, of which he approved, to the effect that the premises hereafter should be valued upon the footing that the tenure was as precarious as it was to-day. But how was that to be estimated? What would be the case twenty years hence? There might be a public-house which was now worth £2,000 a year which would be worth £5,000 a year twenty years hence. The Government had taken language wholly inappropriate and put in a provision which was wholly unmeaning. He would not spend any further time on the clause. The fact was, the proceedings of this Committee were a perfect farce.

Mr. SEELY said he desired to thank those hon. Members who had supported his Amendment. He was not a member of the legal profession, and he did not claim that the wording of his Amendment was absolutely accurate. When the Solicitor-General pointed out that he had not provided in his Amendment for the case of an occupier with a long lease the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly accurate, and words would have to be inserted to secure that object. He should like to point out that his proposal was not intended as a hostile Amendment, but it was intended purely to provide an alternative system to the one which the Government had adopted. The fact that since he had put down his Amendment the Government had put down an Amendment on the same point was sufficient to show that there was a demand for the proposal he had made and some justification for it. Several hon. Members had suggested alternative proposals, but he preferred the general principle of his own proposal to any of the others. He should like to point out that the grave fault in the Amendment put down by the Home Secretary was that if a brewer had a good tenant he would be fined for it. Suppose a brewer had a house worth £5,000, and he had a tenant with a good character—that tenant might receive £1,000 and the brewer £4,000. If the brewer had a tenant with a bad character, in the case he had mentioned the tenant would get £100 and the brewer £4,900. Therefore the man with a good tenant would get considerably less than the man with a bad tenant. That was a fatal objection to the proposal made by the Government which practically left the different people concerned to quarrel amongst themselves as to how this money was to be divided. He thought his proposal was the best one, because it settled how much compensation each person concerned was to receive. With regard to the remarks made by the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries he had said very truly that this Amendment might be divided into two parts, firstly, how to divide the compensation; and secondly, the question of the amount. In regard to the question as to how the compensation should be divided he was prepared to accept any Amendments which were reasonable, but he thought that the principle which he had adopted, namely, that of giving so much to the person employed, so much to the person in occupation, and so much to the owner, was a reasonable and wise principle, and one which he should be glad to see adopted. As was pointed out by the noble Lord the Member for Horncastle, the Prime Minister proposed that a considerable number of houses should be abolished, and under those circumstances a large number of persons might be thrown out of employment. He should be glad if the Government could make some arrangement to compensate those persons. As to the amount of compensation he acknowledged that the question had been fully discussed upon the subject of the time limit, and that point had already been decided by the Committee. His idea in putting down this Amendment was to make the whole principle more complete and to secure that the various persons concerned should receive compensation for any kind of interest they might have in a house which was closed. He wished the occupier to be compensated for his interest and the owner compensated as the ordinary owner and also for his further interest as the owner of a monopoly, which, quite unintentionally, the State had given to him. He did not bind himself to the particular form in which his Amendment was drawn, and he could quite imagine that some other form of words might be better. He thought it would be a wise arrangement for the Government to make if they adopted some proposal by which these different interests were divided and provided for. He should be glad if the Government could see their way either to adopt or amend his Amendment, or, at any rate, give them some assurance that they would adopt the principle it contained.

*Mr. REA (Gloucester) said the proposal before the House was a substantial Amendment, for it gave a share of the compensation to the licence-holder and to all who had an interest in the premises. Hon. Members on both sides of the House had expressed themselves in favour of giving compensation to these people. There was an alternative before the Committee in the shape of three Amendments put down on the Paper in the name of the Home Secretary. It appeared to him that those three Amendments taken together did not with any certainty give any share of compensation to the persons he had alluded to. The first Amendment was on page 31, and it applied to the fixing of the whole sum of compensation which had to be paid for the withdrawal of a licence, and it had no relation whatever to the division of the compensation. The second of the three Amendments to which he alluded, which would be found on page 33, did include the holder of the licence among those persons amongst whom the compensation was to be divided, but it did not say how the compensation was to be divided. The third Amendment he alluded to was on page 35, and it gave an instruction to quarter sessions as to what they were to bear in mind in dividing the compensation, but this only applied to those cases which came before quarter sessions, and the only cases which quarter sessions had anything to say to were the cases in which no agreements existed. It appeared to him that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Lincoln did definitely give a share of the compensation to the holder of the licence and to those employed in the public-house, whilst the three Amendments of the Home Secretary taken together did not secure any such compensation for the persons he had mentioned. He preferred, for these reasons, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Lincoln to the three Amendments put forward by the Home Secretary, and he should heartily vote for it.

*MR. EMMOTT said it was clear, not only that the discussion in so limited a time of Clauses 2 and 3 was a sorry farce, but that the Bill as originally drawn gave everything to the brewer. The Home Secretary's Amendment, giving a small share to the licence-holder, although it might have been foreshadowed by the Solicitor-General about June 9th, was not put down for a month and not till the closure by compartment was carried. It was an insult to the House to put down sweeping Amendments at so late a stage, when the Committee could not discuss them. The Government up to now had not told them whether they meant to do anything for the employés or not. Did the Government recognise that claim? The Committee had the right to an answer. It had been pointed out that if the tenant got more the owner must get less. The Solicitor-General had said that it was to the interest of the owner that the tenant should be a good one and remain long in the house, and so the value of the house would be raised. But why was it, if that were true, that the transfer of tied houses was three or four times as numerous as of other houses? It was because some of the owners preferred a frequent change of tenants, thinking that every new tenant brought new custom without losing much of the old and also because of the iniquitous character of many tied-house agreements. And what did the value of the house depend on in the long run? On the amount of drink sold. He wished to point out to the Solicitor-General that the statement he made that it was to the interest of the tied-house owner to keep his tenant as long as possible was not borne out by facts. He could produce very many instances in which complaint had been made not of the character of the man but because he had not sold enough drink. That was what the tied-house owner looked to, and everybody who knew anything at all about this question knew that. Although he acknowledged the good intentions of this Amendment put forward by the Government he felt most strongly that the effect of the Bill would be to render still shorter the tenure of these tenants, and make it worse than it had been in the past.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said he had already spoken at considerable length upon this Amendment, but he desired to reply to some of the observations which had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries and other hon. Members. The hon and learned Member for Dumfries seemed to think that it was something novel to give compensation for the taking away of a licence, and he had stated that compensation hitherto had only been given when legal right was taken away, and that now they were giving it for an expectation. Did the hon. and learned Member say that if licensed premises had been taken away under the Lands Clauses Act, or for any purpose different from the question of renewal, no compensation would be given?

Sir ROBERT REID said a public authority buying public-house property had no right to interfere with the licence; if they took away the expectation of another person they must pay for it. But it was a very different thing when those who granted a licence upon an annual tenure claimed to exercise their legal right to discontinue it.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement was that compensation had never hitherto been paid for a mere expectation. When licensed premises were taken under the conditions he had stated, they did not value the licence merely as a licence for one year. It might be valued as a licence for twenty-five years, and, even in the case of a reversion with an outstanding lease of twenty-five years, the Courts had held that the mere expectancy of the reversioner that the licence would be renewed from year to year was a matter for compensation. It was the foundation of the argument that they could not with any justice have two systems of legal right running side by side—one under which they deprived a man of what he possessed without a shilling, and the other under which they recognised to the fullest extent the legal expectancy that he had. Hon. Gentlemen were in favour of giving the employé, as contradistinguished from those interested in the licensed premises, some compensation. Had such a principle ever been admitted before? Even when a private individual or a company was authorised to take licensed premises compulsorily, and ordered to pay full compensation, the employés did not get a shilling. What was estimated was the depreciation of property, and that was the whole basis and foundation of the Bill. That might be right or it might be wrong, but what they said was that if a licence was taken away the compensation payable ought to be the difference between the value of the premises with the licence and their value without it. Any other system would be absolutely inconsistent with every principle of compensation when property was taken away for a public purpose which had ever been approved by Parliament. The Government Amendments, he submitted, went to the fullest extent to which the principle of compensation had ever gone. They really went further in including managers who were licence-holders. It was said that the bulk of the compensation would go to the owners, who, in many cases, were the brewers. He totally and absolutely denied it. That matter was left in the discretion of quarter sessions just as much as the question of what was to be given to the lessee.

Mr. ROBSON: In default of agreement.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said the hon. and learned Gentleman would find, if he looked at the Government Amendments, that he was mistaken.

Mr. ROBSON said that when it came to the distribution of the compensation fund quarter sessions had no jurisdiction except in default of agreement. Quarter sessions were entitled and bound to approve any agreement which fixed the amount of the compensation as between the persons interested in the premises. When they came to fixing the precise proportion in which each person should receive it, then quarter sessions had no jurisdiction except in default of agreement. Therefore, it all depended on the agreement.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said the hon. and learned Gentleman was mixing up two things. As regarded the amount of compensation to be fixed, no agreement between the parties would fix that without the confirmation of quarter sessions. When they came to the distribution of the money it was left to quarter sessions to determine the amount. [Mr. Robson: In default of agreement.]—The hon.

and learned Gentleman was quite mistaken. The clause said that the amount was to be divided amongst the persons interested "in such shares as may be settled by agreement, or, in default of agreement, determined by quarter sessions." The Government Amendment proposed to leave out "in default of agreement," so that he was absolutely right in saying that the whole question of what the owner was to get was to be determined by quarter sessions. Quarter sessions, in addition to assessing the value of the legal interest of the holder of the licence, who would either be the lessee or the manager, had also to take into consideration the conduct of the holder and the length of time he had been in possession. He submitted that the Government in thus framing their proposal were taking care, not only of the tenant, but of the manager, who in many cases might be only a simple employé. It had been asked why they did not do the same in regard to the other employés. His answer was that they looked upon the man who held the licence, and who was under pains and penalties for the proper conduct of the premises, as the person who ought to receive the compensation when the licence he held was taken away.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS asked what happened to the occupier of the premises when he was not the licence-holder and when the licence was in the name of the secretary to a brewery company?

SIR EDWARD CARSON thought that very often the transfer of a licence to the secretary of a company was only done whilst a new manager or tenant was being found.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS said that what he wished to know was, in case the occupier was not the licence-holder, would the licence-holder get the compensation and the occupier get nothing.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that would certainly be so. He had already explained that the licensing magistrates who had to deal with the licence-holder put pains and penalties upon him, and for that reason the licence-holder ought to be compensated if the licence was taken away. The hon. Member for Lincoln had said that if an owner happened to have had a bad tenant he would come out of it better than if he had had a good tenant. The Government thought that every encouragement ought to be given to the tenant who conducted his premises in a satisfactory way, and therefore they said that he should be compensated at a higher rate than the tenant who did not conduct his premises in a proper manner. Was it true, as was said by the hon. Member for Lincoln, that the owner would suffer by this proposal? The Government contended that he would not. If a place was badly conducted there was the danger of having convictions endorsed upon the licence, and anyone about to purchase a public-house in the market would look at the register in order to see whether convictions had been recorded, because if the licence had been previously endorsed there would be the danger that the whole licence might be taken away upon another conviction, and the whole value of the licensed premises might thereby be lost. He claimed that under this Bill the owner of the premises was interested in encouraging the licensee to conduct his premises properly.

MR. SEELY asked if the right hon. Gentleman really meant to say that if there had been a new man put in the premises during the last six months the compensation would not be less than it would be to an old tenant?

SIR EDWARD CARSON said the proposal applied to his conduct as well as to the length of time. The Government wished to encourage good tenants to conduct the premises well for a length of time. He thought that the more the Amendment the Government had put upon the Paper was examined the more would it be seen to meet the justice of the case.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that the guillotine was working impartially. On Thursday last it was the British citizen's head that was cut off. To-night the publican's head was going to roll into the basket. The Solicitor-General had tried to explain that under this Amendment the publican was going to get his fair share of the compensation, but it was not the share promised by the Home Secretary. The Home Secretary, in his speech on the Second Reading of the Bill, said the goodwill of a house, and the trade done, often depended very largely upon the popularity of the licensee, and he mentioned the case of the professional cricketer who he thought ought to have a considerable share of the amount awarded. What share was he going to get? According to the theory of the Government,—and he hoped the publicans would notice it—the publicans would find that their compensation had been decreased by limiting the debates. After four or five days discussion they had been given one year's purchase, and probably with a few more days they would have got two or three years. The publican was now to get one year out of fifteen. That was the old cricketer's "considerable share." It seemed to him that the old cricketer was to hold the wicket but the brewer was to get the gate-money. Although they had only been able to discuss this Amendment very briefly they had at any rate made it clear that this was purely an electioneering Bill and simply a brewers' Bill. It was not the old cricketer who supplied the electioneering funds, but the great brewery syndicates, and it was for them and them alone that they were giving this compensation.

Mr. CROOKS: Time, Gentlemen, please?

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said that the Chairman was going to press the button, and he would therefore sit down.

And, it being Eleven of the clock, the Chairman proceeded, in pursuance of the Order of the House of the 5th July, to put the Question on the Amendment already proposed from the Chair.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—Mr. Charles Seely and Mr. Warner.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he wished to move that the vote of the hon. Member for Widnes recorded in the last division be disallowed, on the ground that he had direct pecuniary interest in the subject-matter upon which his vote was given. The effect of the Amendment, if carried, would have diminished the amount of compensation to go to the owner upon a licence being withdrawn. The servants on the licensed premises would have had their share of the compensation fund to the extent of three months wages or salary, and the occupier of the premises as his share would have had a sum equal to two years profits. The hon. Member for Widnes had a direct pecuniary interest, inasmuch as he was the owner of a considerable number of tied houses in Liverpool and other parts of Lancashire. He selected the hon. Member's vote for the Motion not from any personal motive. He did not want the hon. Gentleman or the House to believe that this was a personal attack, but he made the Motion to assert a very important principle. This was a question which ought to be left to the House to decide. He would quote the ruling of the Speaker on 30th April, 1901, given after the Prime Minister had endeavoured to draw a distinction between public and private Bills.

It was not a question of order, it was for the House on each occasion to weigh the advantages and decide. On 11th March, 1892, a Motion was made to disallow the votes of three Members in connection with the Mombasa Railway on the ground of pecuniary interest, and on that occasion the Prime Minister said the principle laid down by the Chair was that no Member should give a vote if his interest was of a direct and personal kind, but that principle must be interpreted by the particular occasion on which the House was called upon to apply it. A Committee sat in 1896 to consider this question, and Mr. Speaker Peel and the present Mr. Speaker declared it important that the House should decide on each particular case. He submitted that this was distinctly a case where it ought to be left to the House to decide. He disclaimed any intention of imputing any corrupt motive. He moved that the vote be disallowed.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid I have very little to add to what I said the other night on the same matter. The hon. Member has practically raised the same point. I based myself on that occasion upon what is the latest pronouncement I can find from the Chair, a pronouncement made in 1898, and it arose on the Local Government (Ireland) Bill, 1898, on Report, Clause 42. That Bill provided for the payment of the landlord's share of the rates out of public money, whereupon an hon. Member raised the same point as the hon. Member has raised to-night, Mr. Speaker being in the Chair; and Mr. Speaker then said what I read out the other night, but for greater lucidity I will read it again —

> "The rule of the House is well understood that there must be a direct pecuniary interest of a private and particular, and not of a public and general nature, and where the question before the House is of a public and general nature, and incidentally involves the pecuniary interests of a class which includes Members of this House, they are not prevented by the rules of the House from voting. In the present case no question of privilege arises."

I can only use exactly the same expressions. Mr. Speaker ruled on that occasion, and did not leave the decision to the House, and I think I am bound to follow his precedent and to rule the same way in this case. What I understand to be the rule is really this — that if an hon. Member has a direct personal pecuniary interest or advantage which he or one or two of his fellows may derive from the passage of a particular Bill he is not entitled to vote upon it. For instance, if a Government proposed a Bill for acquiring property for the purpose of manœuvres on Salisbury Plain or for the establishment of docks in a particular port, then, if an hon. Member happened to be the individual whose land would be taken for that purpose — either for the purpose of manœuvres or docks — it is quite clear that he would have a direct personal pecuniary interet in that Bill passing; but if he was simply one of a class, whether brewers, or solicitors, or landlords, or tenants, or shipowners, or any other class, then the vote would not be disallowed.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE submitted that this was a different case from the Irish case. That was a Bill, not to give a pecuniary advantage to the landlords, but to establish local government in Ireland, though incidentally something was done to benefit the landlords. But this was a Bill—[MINISTERIAL cries of "Chair."] This was a totally different Bill. It was avowed by the Government that this was a Bill to establish compensation, and that was the main and chief object of the Bill. The Chairman had stated that Mr. Speaker's ruling in 1898 was the latest, but the latest ruling was given by Mr. Speaker in 1901.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid that I have nothing to add to what I have already said. The hon. Member has not convinced me that I was wrong on the previous occasion.

THE CHAIRMAN then proceeded successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments moved by the Government of which notice had been given, and on every Question necessary to dispose of the allotted business to be concluded on the 2nd allotted day.

Amendment proposed—

> "In page 2, line 4, to leave out the words 'in default of agreement,' and insert the words 'if an amount is agreed upon by the persons appearing to quarter sessions to be interested in the licensed premises and is approved by quarter sessions, be that amount, and in default of such agreement and approval shall.'"—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Question, "That the Amendment be made," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 8, after the word 'premises,' to insert the words 'including the holder of the licence.'."—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Question, "That the Amendment be made," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 9, to leave out from the word 'be,' to the word 'determined,' in line 10."—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Question, "That the Amendment be made," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 10, at the end, to insert the words 'having regard in the case of the licence-holder not only to his legal interest in the premises but also to his conduct and to the length of time during which he has been the holder of the licence, and the holder of a licence shall (notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary) in no case receive a less amount than he would be entitled to as tenant for a year, or from year to year, of the licensed premises.'"—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Question, "That the Amendment be made," put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD, Somersetshire, Wellington), in moving the adjournment of the House, said the Licensing Bill would be taken this day (Tuesday).

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said he could not make out exactly where the Licensing Bill came on the Order Paper. He presumed that some opportunity would be given of the House considering the question.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD: Perhaps the hon. Member will raise the question to-morrow.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House do now adjourn."—(Sir A. Acland-Hood.)

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) said he wished to call attention to the escape of two indentured Chinese labourers from Johannesburg to Pretoria and their capture in the latter place. When he referred to this matter upon a previous occasion the Colonial Secretary said that he had no information in regard to the imprisonment of these men. Naturally upon all questions affecting personal liberty Irishmen sympathised with the victims of oppression, and he wished to draw attention to the way the right hon. Gentleman had acted in this matter. On Friday last he asked the Colonial Secretary whether he had received the information which was conveyed to the public in a Reuter's telegram, stating that two of these Chinese labourers had escaped from the compounds at the mines, and had managed to get from Johannesburg to Pretoria, which was a distance of forty miles. Upon this point he did not think the Colonial Secretary had treated the House respectfully, because hon. Members were anxious to have the fullest information in regard to the administration of this Ordinance in South Africa. The right hon. Gentleman replied to him, stating that he would not telegraph, but he promised to communicate with Lord Milner by despatch. He had not telegraphed, and therefore it was the right hon. Gentleman's duty to have sent a despatch to Lord Milner by the mail which left for South Africa at two o'clock on Saturday. But there was something far worse connected with this matter, and they had only to look at this Ordinance itself in order to see the very stringent conditions under which these Chinese laboured.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will not be in order in discussing that question, because there is a notice on the Paper in regard to that subject. He will not be out of order in asking for further information in answer to his questions about telegraphing.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said that having regard to the heavy penalties to which these men were liable for escaping, he thought he would be justified in calling attention to those sections of the Ordinance under which they would be liable to punishment. These men were liable to a fine of £10, or one month's imprisonment, for escaping. Then there was the question of the liability of the Englishmen or Boers in Pretoria who had had any dealings with these escaped men. These two Chinamen were found at Pretoria, begging for work, and the men who gave them work were liable to a fine of £500 or two years imprisonment. These poor Chinamen could not have tramped forty miles, they must have gone by train and they must have been "harboured" by some persons, and the persons who harboured them were liable to a fine of £300, or two years imprisonment. Having regard to the awful penalties to which these Chinamen were subjected and the heavy penalties for harbouring them, he thought it was a matter which ought to be brought clearly before the notice of the House, because the House of Commons was responsible for the passing of this Ordinance. He thought they were entitled to the fullest information, and the Minister who endeavoured to conceal and keep from the House information in regard to the atrocities now being enacted, more especially when it had been said that Lord Milner did not care twopence for persons 6,000 miles away, was not treating the House of Commons with respect. The Colonial Secretary ought not to be simply the conduit pipe of Lord Milner, and he ought not to be allowed to treat the House of Commons with contempt. The institution of slavery in South Africa was an abominable thing.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland) said this was not a case of two coolies only, but it was much worse than that. According to the reports, some fifteen coolies had escaped and were seeking work in Pretoria and elsewhere. They had no means of judging whether these reports were true or not, but they had reached this country through well known agencies. He thought these facts justified them in asking that inquiries should be made from Lord Milner. It had been stated that some of these coolies had been arrested and brought before the magistrates, but they did not know whether they had been punished, or sent back to work, or whether they had been sent back to China. They had no information as to whether any persons had been arrested and charged under the Ordinance with harbouring escaped Chinamen. In view of the very great public interest taken in this matter throughout the country, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would inform the House that he would either write or telegraph to Lord Milner for information upon the subject.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington) said he thought it was undesirable constantly to harass with telegrams men who were already burdened with an excess of work. He thought that if he wrote in the ordinary course to Lord Milner and obtained the information desired that was all that could reasonably be demanded on the present occasion. For many years indentured labourers under Ordinances sanctioned by hon. Members opposite had been liable to penalties for desertion. That a few Chinamen out of more than a thousand had been said to have escaped was not sufficient ground, in his judgment, for telegraphing to Lord Milner or seeking information through other than the ordinary channels.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (Yorkshire, W.R., Holmfirth) complained that the manner in which the Colonial Secretary had answered questions on the subject was scarcely that which the House had a right to expect. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to have treated the House as well as his. hon. friend with something like contempt.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) suggested that the Colonial Secretary should urge Lord Milner to have all these Chinamen sent from whence they came, and if he would insist upon proper wages being paid and provide the money for their passage he was sure plenty of white labour for the mines could be found in London.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) asked whether the Colonial Secretary could state the exact number of Chinese who had made their escape. Was it two, seventeen or nineteen? Several conflicting statements had been made in regard to the number who had deserted.

MR. LYTTELTON rose to reply.

*MR. SPEAKER said the right hon. Gentleman had already exhausted his right to speak.

Question put, and agreed to.

HALL-MARKING OF FOREIGN PLATE BILL.

Reported from the Standing Committee without Amendment; and to be read 3ª on Thursday next.

THE PROTECTION OF THE BRITISH FLAG.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I desire to put to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have already given him notice, namely, "What amount of protection is the British flag supposed to confer upon British subjects or others who are on board a ship flying the British flag?" I have put this Question because there is an idea—it may be an erroneous idea—that the officers of a foreign Power cannot arrest anyone on board a British ship and take him from under the British flag unless armed with a letter from either the British Minister or the British Consul authorising them to do so.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): The noble Lord has put a Question to me in very general terms, and he will not be surprised if I reply in equally general language. The best information which I have been able to collect for him is to this effect, that, speaking generally, a British ship on the high seas is regarded as British territory. Persons on board, whether British or foreigners, are regarded as being on British territory, and have the same protection and rights as though they were actually on British territory.

REGISTRATION OF CLUBS (IRELAND) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

*LORD CLONBROCK: My Lords, in asking your Lordships to read this Bill a second time it will not be necessary for me to take up your time with many remarks. A Bill of the same nature passed last year for Scotland, and the year before for this country, the object of all being to put an end to the so-called clubs which are really formed solely for drinking purposes. It has often happened that a man who has been refused a spirit licence, either on the ground of his career or the unsuitability of his premises, has promptly converted his premises into a club, with the result that there is established an unlicensed, irregular, and ill-conducted place of public entertainment. In order to prevent this state of things this Bill provides that all clubs shall be registered, that the registrar shall be the clerk of petty sessions, who shall enter the certificate of registration on this register, and that any application for registration shall be accompanied by a certificate signed by two magistrates of the district, and by two copies of all the rules of the club; also, notice must be given in a newspaper circulating in the district in which the application is made. These rules are set forth in Clause 4 of the Bill. I need not go through them beyond mentioning that they are practically identical with the rules in the Act relating to Scotland which was passed last year, with one exception, to which I attach some importance, and which I will mention in a moment.

Objections can be raised before the Court of petty sessions by the Constabulary or the Metropolitan Police in Dublin, or by anyone resident in the district, on grounds set forth in Clause 5, and the magistrates, after considering both the application and the objections, can either give or withhold the certificate. Again, in the case of a renewal, the same course takes place, the same objections can be made, and the magistrates will then decide whether the club has been properly conducted according to the rules, and will only renew the certificate on those conditions. This Bill has passed the House of Commons with the approval of all Parties—a happy state of things which does not usually obtain in regard to legislation connected with Ireland. I understand that His Majesty's Government propose to insert some Amendments, one of which is of considerable importance, but the others are more or less of a drafting character.

In the Bill, as it stands, there is an absolute prohibition of the sale of excisable liquor to any member of a club to be consumed off the premises. This is an unnecessarily stringent provision, and it is not in either the Scottish or the English Act. It interferes with the liberty of respectable members of a club who would, for instance, be prevented, when going for a day's fishing or for a day in the country, from taking any alcoholic liquor with them to be consumed, say, with their luncheon. The Amendment which is to be moved by His Majesty's Government has for its object the sanctioning of this sale to members within limited hours—that is, between the hour of eight o'clock in the morning and the hour of ten o'clock at night. I think that is a very reasonable Amendment, and one which ought to be accepted. Although I approve of the terms of the Amendment to be moved on behalf of His Majesty's Government, I intend to move one of my own, which I like better.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(Lord Clonbrock.)

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: My Lords, I have only to say, on behalf of the Irish Government, that there is no objection to this Bill. I shall, however, have a few Amendments, many of a merely drafting character, to move besides the one referred to by the noble Lord.

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

CROWN AGENTS AND SHIPPING RATES.

*THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH rose to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies the following Questions:—I. Is it the fact that one of the Crown Agents is a director of the London Assurance Company, and is such appointment in accordance with the regulations of the Civil Service; and why are not the Crown Agents paid a fixed salary like other members of the Civil Service sufficient to preclude their receiving any other emoluments? II. (1) Is the Under-Secretary for the Colonies aware that the British India Steam Navigation Company has recently joined what is known as the "Shipping Ring," namely, that association of shipping firms carrying goods to South Africa which has agreed to maintain a high rate of transport for freights? (2) Is the Under-Secretary aware that at the present time freights between England and South Africa have been raised to about 38s. a ton, whereas from New York to South Africa they are only 12s. a ton? (3) Is the Under-Secretary aware that the result of this raising of the freights levied by all British shipping firms trading with South Africa is such as to cause increased orders for goods to be placed in New York and in other parts of the United States of America, in order to take advantage of the low freight (12s. a ton) from American ports to South Africa, while something of the same kind takes place with regard to Belgium and Western Germany in connection with the transport from Hamburg? (4) Will the Under-Secretary state the arrangements which have been made by the Crown Agents in connection with the shipping of Government goods to South Africa during the last six months, giving the names of the firms employed and the rate of freight agreed upon?

He said: My Lords, in putting the Questions standing in my name on the Paper, I must apologise for their length, but my remarks upon them will be very short. As regards the first Question, the information which I am particularly anxious to elicit is whether or not the Crown Agents are considered a department of the Colonial Office, and whether they therefore come under the regulations and conditions of the Civil Service. If it is true that the Crown Agents are permitted to hold other posts, which I am informed is the case, it is hardly fair that that prohibition should apply to other civil servants, like those connected with the Foreign Office. This is not the occasion, nor the time, to consider the propriety or impropriety of the existing regulations concerning the Civil Service; but I wish to point out, with regard to this directorship of the London Assurance Company, that this company does, so I am informed, do the chief, if not the whole, of the insurance business of the Crown Agents' department. It would appear to me that in the interests of the public service, and in the interests of sound administration, the insurance business of the Crown Agents should be put up to tender, and should be tendered for by a certain number of the first-class insurance agencies. It is not, in itself, satisfactory that a Crown Agent should be a director of any particular insurance company.

With regard to the question of the rates of freight between this country and South Africa as compared with the freights from New York to South Africa, I may mention that while in some cases the freights between England and South Africa have been raised to about 38s. a ton, the latest information which I have received is that the average rate of freight by the Conference Lines—that is, the shipping ring—is at the present moment 30s. a ton to South African ports from Great Britain, as compared with 12s. a ton from New York to South Africa. I should like to make this other statement in connection with the question of the shipping ring, that I am informed that this ring, which consists almost entirely of British firms, has established, and is now maintaining, a fleet of steamers running between New York and South African ports to carry American manufactures at less than one-half the rate of freight charged from British ports. I beg to put the Questions standing in my name.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Duke of MARLBOROUGH): My Lords, the noble Earl has been very considerate in not departing from the Questions he has put down on the Paper and pursuing other matters of Colonial administration which I admit on a previous occasion he could not help following. He has on the present occasion confined himself entirely to the Questions on the Paper, and I am sure the noble Earl would wish that I should reply to them more or less categorically. He asks me, in the first place, whether it is the fact that one of the Crown Agents is a director of the London Assurance Company. The answer to that is in the affirmative. Then the noble Earl is anxious to know whether such appointment is in accordance with the regulations of the Civil Service. I must explain to the noble Earl that the Crown Agents, technically, are not Civil servants; but I will not press that point to the extent of giving the reasons why. I am in perfect agreement with him that it is unusual—in fact, I do not think it is possible—for members of the Civil Service to hold directorships.

Then the noble Earl wishes to know whether the Crown Agents are paid a fixed salary. I think I told him when we last debated this question that their salaries were fixed, and could only be altered at the wish, or with the sanction, of the Secretary of State. The fact that one of the Crown Agents (Sir Ernest Blake) holds a directorship is somewhat exceptional. I do not think I need go into the reasons why Sir Ernest Blake holds this appointment. He has conducted his work as a Crown Agent in a most admirable and proper manner, and I do not think the fact that he has been a director of this assurance company has been detrimental in any way to the public service over which he presides. The noble Earl is no doubt aware that this matter has already been brought up in another place, and the Secretary of State, in reply, said he would consider the question. I can assure the noble Earl that the Crown Agent in question has put himself entirely in the hands of the Secretary of State, who is considering this question and will give his decision when the Colonial Office Vote is taken in the House of Commons. In view of the fact that the Colonial Office Vote must be taken at a date not very far distant, and in view, moreover, of the fact that this is a somewhat personal matter, involving the private affairs of a public servant who is under the authority of the Secretary of State, I hope the noble Earl will take my assurance that the matter is being considered, and will agree with me that it would be better and more appropriate that the announcement of the Secretary of State's decision should be given by the Secretary of State himself.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: I quite agree with the noble Duke on that point.

*THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: The noble Earl next asks me whether I am aware that the British India Steam Navigation Company has recently joined what is known as the shipping ring. Yes, I can assure the noble Earl that we are perfectly aware of that fact. The other day the noble Earl below the Gangway (Earl Grey) deplored the fact that the Colonial Office had not employed this line, and he called it the "one solitary independent line." We were perfectly aware of the fact that the British India Steam Navigation Company had close commercial relations with the Conference Lines. There is an agreement with the Conference Lines to this effect, that the British India Steam Navigation Company will not deliver any goods from this country to any of the South African ports, except Beira and Delagoa Bay, and I am informed, moreover, that even with regard to these ports the rates are not competitive. It is, therefore, perfectly clear that they are not an independent line. There is no real competition between this country and South Africa, and it would be impossible for us to regard the British India Steam Navigation Company as an independent line, or to contemplate treating them as such as long as they have this agreement with the Conference Lines.

EARL GREY: Can the noble Duke inform the House of the date of the agreement between the British India Steam Navigation Company and the Conference ring?

*THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: I am afraid I cannot give the noble Lord the exact date. I rather think it was about twelve months ago; and subsequent to that agreement they made a second one, so I am informed, to the effect that the rates even to Delagoa Bay and Beira are no longer free and independent rates. They have come to a definite understanding with the Conference ring as to what those rates should be. Therefore, I think the noble Earl will admit that the British India Company is not an independent line, but is closely associated with the Conference. The noble Earl who placed these Questions on the Paper next asks whether I am aware that at the present time freights between England and South Africa have been raised, and are higher than the rates between America and South Africa. It is very difficult to form an accurate opinion, because it is so hard to make an accurate comparison. In the first place, we require the whole of the American tariff and the whole of the English tariff, and then it is not a question of average. Three or four different tables or classes are laid down. There are first, second, third, and fourth classes, and goods are classified under these different heads. For instance, rails would be under the lowest class of all—the cheapest class, whilst small parcels of breakable goods would probably come under the most expensive class, so that unless you have before you the different rates and can ascertain to which schedule a particular article belongs, I submit it is most difficult to make an accurate and proper comparison.

*THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: It is quite true that there are different rates according to different scales, but my point is this, that I have found out that the average difference between the rates from this country and from America bears this enormous disproportion.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: The noble Earl may be correct in his average. I am quite unable to say, for I do not know how it is arrived at. It is most difficult and complicated. In addition, you have to take into consideration the cost of landing, lighterage, and sorting, which the shippers have to do. Although I will not challenge the statement of the noble Earl that the American rates are lower than the English rates, yet I do submit that it is most difficult to ascertain the difference between the two rates, because there are so many complicated items which have to be considered. I do not think the noble Earl is correct in saying that the freights from New York to South Africa are only 12s. a ton. My information is that they vary from 15s. to 17s. 6d. a ton, and I believe I am right in saying that the lowest public rate between this country and South Africa is about 25s. a ton, so the noble Earl will see that the difference between 17s. 6d. and 25s., though I admit it is considerable, is somewhat less than that which he has quoted to your Lordships.

Then the noble Earl suggests that the result of this raising of freights levied by British shipping firms upon trade between this country and South Africa is to increase the trade between America and South Africa. It may be that the trade between America and South Africa is increasing. No doubt the noble Earl has evidence to support that view, but I do not know that it has increased quite to the extent that he seems to infer. Americans are extremely clever traders, and many articles may be required in South Africa which cannot be obtained in this country, and unless the noble Earl can show me that the trade between America and South Africa in goods similar to those which can be sent from this country has increased, I do not think there is very much to complain of. We cannot object, for instance, to large consignments of grain going from America to the Cape, and if very low freights are quoted, it is clear that the Americans will get the control, or, at any rate, the largest order in that particular commodity.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: Will the noble Duke give us the comparative volume of trade between the two countries and South Africa in the last few months?

*THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: I am afraid I cannot give that, but I know, with regard to the total South African trade, that at present we possess two-thirds and that one-third is enjoyed by America and other countries. As to the low rates which the noble Earl has quoted, can he assure me that the American shippers are making a profit? I am informed that they are losing a considerable amount of money in quoting these low freights, and that they have only done so in order to try and undercut the English trade and eventually get a monopoly. I think it is reasonable to suppose that they will not succeed in their design. The result will be that these low freights, which I do not deny may now exist, will not be at all permanent. I anticipate seeing in a few months, perhaps a year, the 17s. 6d. increased to a higher figure. I cannot quite agree with the statement which the noble Earl makes at the end of his Question, that something of the same kind takes place with regard to Belgium and Western Germany in connection with the transport from Hamburg. My information is that the German lines all belong to the Conference, and that the rate of freight on the sea is uniform, and is the same from Germany to South Africa as it is from this country. But the reason why the Germans are able to send their goods to South Africa cheaper than we can is this—that the German State railways grant a preferential rate to manufactured goods from the places of manufacture to the port where they are shipped, and consequently, as they gain an advantage on the railway rates, they can naturally quote in South Africa through rates which are more favourable than those which British shipowners can offer, and no doubt that is the explanation why the Germans are pushing forward their trade in South Africa at the present moment.

The noble Earl was anxious to know what arrangements have been made by the Crown Agents in connection with the shipping of Government goods to South Africa. I cannot give the noble Earl a full statement of the contract which the Crown Agents have made with the Conference lines. It is a very long and complicated document, and I feel sure that the noble Earl would not wish me to occupy the time of the House in presenting it. Moreover, I do not think it would be altogether in the interests of the public service that it should be published in its entirety. I suppose the noble Earl wants to know roughly what agreement has been made in order that he can compare it with the public rates, or assure himself that the Crown Agents have made proper and reasonable terms on behalf of the Colonial Office. We believe that the arrangement which the Crown Agents have made with the Conference lines for the shipment of goods from this country is a reasonable and a good arrangement, and one which compares very favourably with those made in previous years. To give the noble Earl an instance, I may mention that 30,000 tons of rails are to be shipped this year to South African ports at a uniform rate of 16s. per ton. For a somewhat smaller consignment of rails the price is higher, namely, 18s. 6d. a ton. Then arrangements have been made to ship locomotives and building material at 20s. a ton; but the noble Earl will understand that in addition there are, of course, lighterage, sorting, and other charges to be added, these being charges which the Conference lines, and indeed, all shipping lines, make to the public or to the Government.

The noble Earl asked me to state the names of the firms employed. I presume he means by that the names of the companies in the Conference lines. The names as are follow: The Union Castle Mail Steamship Co., The Clan Line of Steamers, the Bucknall Steamship Line, Ballard, King & Co., John T. Rennie & Co., the Ellerman Harrison Line, and R. P. Houston & Co. With regard to the general question, I do not know whether the noble Earl, in asking for this information, was inclined to consider that this question of freights was directly connected with the business of the Crown Agents. I hope he will not assume that because he can show that the freights between America and the Cape are lower than those between this country and the Cape that has anything to do with the efficiency of the administration of the Crown Agents. All that they are concerned to do is to carry out the orders they receive from the Colonial Office, and we believe that the agreement they have made on behalf of the Colonial Office for the shipment of goods from this country to South Africa is not only a good agreement but one which will give satisfaction to the Governments of the Transvaal and of the Orange River Colony.

As to the question of getting a better rate for the public, that is entirely outside the province of the Crown Agents. It is a matter which the Government alone could undertake or examine, and it is very doubtful whether it would be wise for the Government to do so. The noble Earl may have read the Report of a Committee of the House of Commons, presided over by Mr. Evelyn Cecil, which went very carefully into the question whether it would be wise for the Government to grant subsidies to any particular steamship lines for the purpose of encouraging trade in any part of the world. They unanimously came to the conclusion that it would be unwise for the Government to do so, and, furthermore, they pointed out that in the case of Continental Powers that had given these subsidies, they did not think their action had been advantageous. I know that the noble Earl is solicitous for the welfare of persons trading between this country and South Africa, a feeling which I myself share, and he may be interested to know that the various Governments in South Africa propose sending representatives to a conference which is to take place in South Africa to discuss this question of the rate of freights. Until we know what the result of that conference is, until we are informed of the wishes and views of the people of South Africa themselves upon this subject, it would be premature for His Majesty's Government to offer any opinion upon such a difficult and complicated matter.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I desire to conform in every way to the rules of debate in your Lordships' House, but really the noble Duke makes it extremely difficult for me to do so. He was asked certain Questions on matters of fact, but in replying to those Questions he has delivered a speech brimming over with controversial matter and matter of opinion. There is no Motion before the House, and I am conscious that I am debarred by the rules which govern debates here from making a speech in answer to the observations which we have just listened to from the noble Duke, but, with the permission of the House, I will briefly refer to one of the points in the noble Duke's speech. The noble Duke has twitted me with having misinformed the House on the last occasion when this question was under debate, and with having told your Lordships that the British India Steamship Company was an independent line of steamers so far as Delagoa Bay was concerned. It is true that I made the statement that at that time the company was, as I believed, an independent line to Delagoa Bay. Of course, I was aware that there was an arrangement between that company and the Conference lines with regard to the South African ports, but that arrangement left Delagoa Bay an open field for competition between the British India Steamship Company and the Conference lines.

I asked His Majesty's Government whether they would support this independent line to Delagoa Bay, the owners of which were more anxious to get a share of the freight consigned to that port than to obtain a subsidy from the Government. The extraordinary answer I received from Lord Onslow was—"How can His Majesty's Government even consider the expediency of shipping freight to Delagoa Bay by a steamship company that does not want to stop at Cape Town or Port Elizabeth"? I did think that was trifling with the business capacity of this House. Delagoa Bay was a port at which the British India Steamship Company, certainly at the beginning of this session, was perfectly entitled to compete with the Conference lines. I want to know whether His Majesty's Government ever gave them an opportunity of tendering for a single ton of cargo to Delagoa Bay. I also want to know whether His Majesty's Government ever gave an opportunity of tendering for a single ton of cargo to Messrs. Houston & Company when that was an independent line. It is my belief that it is the action of the Government in refusing to support the independent lines which has forced those lines one after the other into the Conference ring. I warned your Lordships in the last debate that if you pursued this policy of only feeding the Conference lines and did not follow the example of the Indian Government in supporting the independent lines, you would force the British India Steamship Company in its turn into the Conference ring. There is a great deal more to be said in answer to the noble Duke, but as we shall, no doubt, have another opportunity of discussing the points raised, I will not longer detain your Lordships now.

EDUCATION GRANTS.

EARL BATHURST, who had a Question on the Paper to the following effect: "To ask the President of the Board of Education whether the Board of Education are aware that by the proposed change in the system of grants as announced in Article 31 of the Code for 1904, that on fourteen typical schools, six being town schools of sixteen departments, and eight country schools under the Gloucestershire Education Authority, having 5,049 children on their books, the loss in grant on that number will be £125 19s., or 5.98d. per scholar, and that, if, as it seems reasonable to expect, this result will follow throughout the county, the loss on an average attendance of 48,000 will be £1,196 per annum,"—said: My Lords, I feel that I owe some apology to your Lordships for the length of time this Question has appeared on the Paper in my name. Although it has lain there almost dormant I think it has had a very good effect, for I have been informed that the new Code of grants has already been entirely withdrawn. This Question, therefore, comes before your Lordships rather late in the day. It was my intention, in asking it, to bring to your Lordships' notice the loss that would be entailed on local education authorities by this new scheme, and to ask the Board of Education whether they would postpone its coming into effect for a year, or at least until such time as the local education authorities had been able to consult with one another and with the Board of Education, so that a thoroughly satisfactory Code might be drawn up with full knowledge of what its effect would be. As the Code is now withdrawn, it will be unnecessary for me to enter into any of the figures, of which I have a good many with me, the object of my Question having been achieved. I have, however, brought this subject to your Lordships' notice today, as the noble Marquess the President of the Board of Education very courteously said he was willing to make a statement on the question which, no doubt, will interest many of your Lordships who take an active part in the work of county councils. I beg, in conclusion, to thank the noble Marquess for the consideration he has shown me in making the desired inquiries, and also for withdrawing the Code.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (The Marquess of LONDONDERRY): My Lords, my noble friend has been kind enough to thank me for what he calls the courtesy shown to him. I feel, if I may say so, that the boot is on the other leg. It is I who owe him a debt of gratitude for the considerate manner in which from time to time he has postponed this Question, which, as he has told your Lordships, has been on the Paper for some time. I was very anxious to go fully into this question of the scale of grants before giving my noble friend what I hoped would be an answer of a satisfactory character. As my noble friend has told your Lordships, the scale of grants which we inserted in the Code has now been withdrawn, and I do not, therefore, think it necessary to go at any length into the question of what might or might not have been the result of that scale had it been continued.

While I do not propose to give your Lordships a long dissertation on the reasons why we inserted this scale of grants in the Code, it may not be out of place if, in a very few words, I place before you our object in introducing it and our reason for withdrawing it. The Board of Education introduced the scale of grants in question in order to complete those changes in the methods of distributing the grant to public elementary schools which were initiated by the block grant established in 1900, which has been operative since 31st March, 1901. We proposed that the scale of grants should be—15s. average attendance for children under five years of age; 20s. average attendance from five to twelve years of age; and 25s. average attendance over twelve years of age; as against what had been the previous grant of 17s. for infants and 22s. for older scholars.

We considered that in framing this scale we were assisting the classification of children for instruction, and producing, to a certain extent, greater independence of financial considerations. We also considered that with this change it would be possible for inspectors the better to advise us as to improvements. We certainly thought that a higher rate should be paid for scholars who remained at school a year after twelve than should be paid in respect of a year before five. I think your Lordships will acknowledge that the reason for that is a sound one, inasmuch as it is possible for children over twelve years of age to obtain the practical advantages of education to a greater extent in proportion than children under the age of five. We had hoped that this alteration in the scale of grants, this increase in that direction, would have proved an attraction which would have been taken advantage of.

I do not for a moment controvert what my noble friend stated with regard to there being losses in some districts and gains in others. In the Question on the Paper the noble Earl goes very closely into the figures and the manner in which his own native county, Gloucestershire, would be affected. Not being prepared to argue this point, inasmuch as the scale has now been withdrawn, I have not gone very carefully into the figures submitted, but I cannot help thinking that if we had gone very closely into those figures we might have found that the state of affairs was not quite so black as my noble friend has painted them. We fully recognised that there would have been losses in some districts, but we had hoped that the gains in others might have been the means of counterbalancing the losses, and that the authorities in those districts would have seen their way for a time to endure the small losses in order to gain the greater benefits which we believed would accrue. But experience has shown that this was not the case, and as we fully recognised that there was considerable opposition in certain districts we did not think we were justified in retaining those clauses in the Code. I do not for one moment admit that we were wrong in inserting them in the first instance. Although we felt bound to withdraw the scale in view of the hardship some districts believed that they would suffer, we still firmly believe in its principle, and I hope that those districts will, in course of time, come to see the advantages of the system.

THE CASE OF CONSTABLE ANDERSON.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government whether they will lay on the Table of the House all official Papers and correspondence connected with the case of Constable Anderson, of the Royal Irish Constabulary. When I gave notice of this Question yesterday, I was careful to explain to the House that it was not my intention to raise a discussion, at all events on this occasion, upon the subject to which it refers. The case of Constable Anderson is one of a peculiar character, and has aroused an immense amount of feeling throughout the country. It has formed the subject of many writings in newspapers and elsewhere, and it has also, I think, caused some disturbance of mind to those who, like your Lordships, are anxious that nothing should be done to exacerbate the feelings between the various religious sects in Ireland. I am not aware of exactly how much information we have before us on this case. I believe that in the shape of Answers to Questions in another place the Chief Secretary has given certain information to the Members of the other House, and I believe also that the particulars of the trial of Constable Anderson are to be obtained, though I confess I have not been able to see them. I venture to put it to your Lordships that if this case is to be considered in this House—and I think it is almost impossible that it should not be raised in some form or other—it would be desirable, not only for our sakes, but for the sake of His Majesty's Government, that all the information that can be conveniently given should be afforded to the House. I am not aware whether the subject will be raised in another place, though I have heard that such is the expectation; but whether that is so or not, I venture to ask His Majesty's Government whether they will lay upon the Table any—I should prefer to say all—official communications which have passed on this subject. I do so with a desire that if the subject is discussed it should be discussed with full and perfect information, which we have certainly not got at present. I should be glad if His Majesty's Government would return a favourable Answer to my Question.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): My Lords, any request coming from the noble Earl, who has had so long and so distinguished a connection with the Government of Ireland would, of course, meet with a most ready and cordial response from those who are at present responsible for the Executive administration of that country; but I am informed that there are no documents which they can, in accordance with practice and convenience, lay on the Table of your Lordships' House. But when my noble friend desires to discuss the subject in detail he will find any materials that he may require in the very numerous Questions and Answers in the other House of Parliament. Though I have not myself seen it, there is also, I believe, a report of the evidence that was taken at the inquiry.

EARL CADOGAN: Which inquiry.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: At the second Court of Inquiry, at which sworn evidence was taken. I am told that it appeared in the Press, and, if so, it is accessible to everyone who desires to see it. I am not in a position to meet my noble friend further; but whenever he deems it right to raise the question, it will, of course, be my duty to be here and to give such explanation as may be desirable.

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I fully share the views of the noble Earl opposite —that it is extremely difficult to deal with this subject without more information than apparently we now have. The noble and learned Lord, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, replied that there is, so far as he knows, sufficient information in Answers to Questions in another place. My noble friend the late Lord-Lieutenant certainly did not seem to think that information sufficient, and then the noble and learned Lord said it was not usual to produce Papers such as those asked for. Every case of this kind must be decided upon its merits, and if this case is one of very great importance, as apparently it is, I think an exception to the usual practice should be made, and if there are any Papers and documents which bear materially upon it I would press His Majesty's Government to produce them. I am told that the Irish newspapers have been full of this case for some time past; and from the leading organs here we know that there is a good deal of feeling on the subject, and that it is a question of some importance. I would, therefore, ask the noble and learned Lord whether in this case he cannot see his way to produce other documents than the one which he says is available bearing materially on this case and putting it properly before the public.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I am sure nothing is further from the desire of the Irish Government than to suppress any information which can properly be given to the public, and it occurs to me that matters would be rather advanced if the noble Earl would give us an idea of the kind of documents which he thinks might be produced. One important document has been referred to by the noble and learned Lord—namely, that containing the finding of the Court of Inquiry.

EARL CADOGAN: The evidence.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The evidence of the Court of Inquiry, and, I imagine, the orders passed upon it by the Lord-Lieutenant. I understand that these documents are already public property. If the noble Earl will tell us what other Papers he would desire to possess we will certainly consider his demand for their production.

EARL SPENCER: I can only speak from past experience in these matters. I have myself held the position of Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and, so far as I know, there must have been minutes on this subject—minutes by the Inspector-General of Constabulary, minutes regulating the Court of Inquiry, and minutes which would show how the final decision took place. I understand that there have been several decisions on the point, and there must be Papers on which the final decision, which is, I understand, to reinstate this constable, was based. I am not expressing any shadow of opinion one way or the other; but, in a case of this sort, where there is strong feeling and a great desire to get at the bottom of the matter, I think more official documents than those to which reference has been made ought to be produced.

LORD ASHBOURNE: I will mention the matter to the Chief Secretary, in whose competence it is, and ascertain if there are any documents which, in his opinion, can, in the interests of the public service, be laid on the Table.

EARL CADOGAN: It was because I did not in any way wish to embarrass His Majesty's Government that I did not mention any particular document which I wished produced. I should be quite content if His Majesty's Government would agree to afford us any information they can, and lay on the Table of the House such documents as they think can be laid without any injury to the public service.

House adjourned at half-past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 12th July, 1904.

ELECTRIC POWER UNDERTAKINGS.

Return ordered, "showing the names of companies or persons who have obtained Acts conveying powers for the supply of Electric Power to Districts, with the names and areas of such Districts and the year in which the powers were obtained, and whether such powers have been exercised or not; and, in the former case, what is the state of the Works constructed under such powers."—(Mr. Gerald Balfour.)

PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES ACTS, 1879 AND 1884.

Address for "Return showing the working of the Regulations made in 1886 for carrying out the Prosecution of Offences Acts, 1879 and 1884, with Statistics setting forth the number, nature, result, and cost of the Proceedings instituted by the Director, in accordance with those Regulations, from the 1st day of January, 1903, to the 31st day of December, 1903 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 209, of Session 1903)."—(Mr. Cochrane.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Religious Examinations in Schools—Permission of the Local Authority.

MR. SOAMES (Norfolk, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Board of Education whether he is aware that the ordinary work of the national school at Wortwell, Norfolk, was suspended on Friday, 24th June, for an examination in religious knowledge, by the diocesan inspector, without leave from the local authority; and, if so, whether he will give instructions that the permission of the local authority must in future be obtained before the school work is interrupted for this purpose.

(Answered by Sir William Anson.) I have no information as to the particular case referred to in the Question. This matter is governed by Section 76 of The Elementary Education Act, 1870, under which managers are entitled to fix a day or days, not more than two in number, for the inspection or examination of the school by the diocesan inspector. The notice which the section requires is to be given in the school. The section says nothing of notice to the local authority; though under the changed conditions of the Act of 1902 it would certainly appear to be desirable, as a matter of courtesy and convenience, that such notice should be given.

Obstruction of Main Street in Omagh by Farming Machines.

DR. THOMPSON (Monaghan, N.): To ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland if he is aware of the obstruction to traffic in the main street of the town of Omagh caused by the exhibition of dangerous and unprotected farming machines and implements; is he aware that the street is blocked to a distance of fifteen feet from the pathway with these implements; and, if so, will he explain why, although frequent complaints have been made to the police, this public danger not only remains unabated but is daily growing more serious.

(Answered by Mr. Atkinson.) The Towns Improvement Act of 1854 has been adopted in Omagh, and offences of the character mentioned are prosecuted by the town commissioners. The police have reported all cases of obstruction of the thoroughfares to the commissioners, but the latter have declined to institute proceedings. I am considering the question of directing the police, under the circumstances, to take proceedings under the 92nd Section of the Act.

Outstanding Exchequer Bonds and Treasury Bills.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, what is the amount at present outstanding of Exchequer Bonds and Treasury Bills respectively.

(Answered by Mr Austen Chamberlain.)

Exchequer Bonds . .	20,500,000
Treasury Bills . . .	26,633,000*
	47,133,000

* N.B.—£5,500,000 of these Bills are advances on Ways and Means, and must be paid off within the financial year.

State of Affairs in the Aden Hinterland.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has received any information as to the state of affairs in the Aden Hinterland which would account for the despatch of an increased military force from Aden.

(Answered by Mr Secretary Brodrick.) In consequence of a threatened attack by the Kotaibi on our post at Sulek, which is about fifty-five miles from Aden on the route northwards, the Resident, as a precautionary measure, strengthened the post and the communications between it and Aden. These measures, according to a report received by telegraph on the 10th instant, seem to have had the desired effect.

Members of Royal Irish Constabulary Punished at Instance of County Inspector Ball.

MR. P. A. McHUGH (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can give the number of sergeants and constables of the Royal Irish Constabulary punished at the instance of County Inspector Ball since his appointment to county Leitrim.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) Two sergeants were punished at the instance of the county inspector since the date referred to, January, 1902. Two constables were also fined by him in the same period on reports made by their officers.

Sanitary Condition of Irish Workhouses.

DR. THOMPSON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware of the state of dirt and neglect to which the poor of Irish workhouses are exposed; that in many of these institutions there are no baths, water-closets, water supply, or other sanitary conveniences; and whether, seeing that these institutions are inspected by non-professional inspectors, without any scientific attainments or special knowledge, he will direct that in future these institutions, and especially the hospitals, shall be inspected by medical and not lay inspectors.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The poor in Irish workhouses are not in a state of dirt and neglect. They are much cleaner and are better cared for than the poor outside the workhouses. If, however, the hon. Member will refer me to any workhouse in which it is suggested that the contrary is the case I shall be pleased to cause an investigation to be made. The workhouses are visited periodically by experienced lay inspectors, and I am not aware that they discharge their duty less efficiently because they have no scientific attainments. The workhouse hospitals are inspected by two medical inspectors specially appointed for the purpose.

Sanitary Condition of Glenties Workhouse.

DR. THOMPSON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that in the Glenties Workhouse there is no water supply; that there are no baths or water-closets, or means of heating water, and that notwithstanding the frequent application of the authorities of the hospital and workhouse, these necessaries remain unsupplied; and, if so, will he direct the Local Government Board to insist on the immediate remedy of the grievances.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The water supply in this workhouse is defective. Basins and portable baths are, however, provided in the hospital. The Local Government Board inspector has repeatedly called attention to the necessity for a sufficient water supply, and the board of guardians some time ago obtained plans for the work as well as for water-closets and bathroom accommodation; but, in view of the poverty and high rates in the district, the guardians decided to await the Report of the Poor Law Reform Commission before incurring the heavy expense of a better water supply.

Pensions for Junior Literary Assistants of the Irish National Education Commissioners.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland the number of junior literary assistants at present engaged by the Commissioners of National Education and National Schools of Ireland; and whether, considering the long service at low salaries rendered to the Commissioners by junior literary assistants, the Government will consider the advisability of allowing them pensions or compensation when they are unfit for work, the same as now applies in the case of national teachers.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The number of junior literary assistants in the service of the Commissioners is eleven. Teachers of this class are entitled to retiring gratuities under the old arrangements which were applicable to all teachers before the introduction of the Teachers' Pension Act. They are not eligible for pensions under the Teachers' Pension Act. This class of teacher is fast dying out and no new appointments are made.

Assistant Teachers in Irish National Schools.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.) To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the number of assistant teachers employed in Irish national schools; how many of those have been trained; what is the highest grade and salary they can reach as assistants; how many years must elapse under most favourably circumstances before they can reach the maximum; why it is that the spirit of the recent rules, which gives promotion and increase of salary to all others, is denied only to the assistants; whether, under those circumstances, steps will be taken to enable assistants of ten years service and classed under old rules as second-class to be promoted to second grade.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The number of assistant teachers employed in the year 1903 was 3,787, of whom 1,590 were trained. Assistants, as a rule, can only rank in the third grade, but may, under exceptional circumstances and by special order of the Board, be promoted above third grade (Rule 195f). So long as assistants are in the third grade, the maximum salary for men is £86 per annum, and for women £72 10s. per annum, in both cases exclusive of capitation fees, out of the school grant under the Irish Education Act of 1902. An assistant entering the service at the minimum salary would reach the maximum of the third grade under ordinary circumstances, if his service was good, in nine years. Under special and exceptional circumstances he might reach the maximum of the third grade, or even of a higher grade, in a much shorter time, but there is no fixed time limit. The new rules provide for increases of salary to assistants under ordinary circumstances, and for promotions of assistants under exceptional circumstances, but it was never contemplated, and it would not be desirable, to give assistants the same rights as principals in regard to promotion. The Commissioners desire that principals should, as a rule, be recruited from experienced assistants, but few assistants would be willing to take principalships with the corresponding increased responsibilites if they could, from the monetary point of view, do as well by remaining assistants. In reply to the concluding inquiry, I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member's previous Question of the 29th of June† on the same subject.

Whisky for Inmates of the Naas Union — Refund of Duty.

MR. LEAMY (Kildare, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the quarter cask of whisky, containing about 62 gallons, which had been procured by the guardians of the Naas Union for the use of the inmates, has become not potable owing to having been reduced by water which was subsequently found to have been polluted, and that the Local Government Board has ordered it to be destroyed; and, if so, whether, seeing that the duty has been paid on it, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue will either refund the duty or make some allowance in respect thereof, seeing that the guardians were at the loss of the material and have had to replace it.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The facts are as stated. The workhouse master who was responsible for the loss has since been required to resign. The guardians communicated with the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and were informed that the latter have no power to make any repayment of duty in respect of spirits which have passed out of Revenue control.

Gold Output of Transvaal Mines—White and Native Labour.

Dr. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state the value of the gold output in the Transvaal mines for June, 1904, together with the white and native labour employed in the mining industry during the same month; whether he can state further the same facts for each month of 1904; and whether he can give the same facts for each of the periods of six months, as follows: July to December, 1901, January to June, 1902, July to December, 1902, January to June, 1903, July to December, 1903, and January to June, 1904.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) The following are the figures I am able to give:—

Transvaal Gold Mines.

Maltese Finance.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that three months have elapsed since the close of the financial year in Malta, he will undertake that a copy of the balance-sheet for the year will be available for Members of the House before the Vote on the Colonial Estimates is taken.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick, Leamington): I have received a telegram from the Governor of Malta stating that the Annual Account for the year 1903–4 would be ready on the 11th of July; it should, therefore, reach the Colonial Office in about a week from that date. The account will then be printed and laid before Parliament.

Prosecution of Fortune-tellers.

MR. JOHN CAMPBELL (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state the number of prosecutions and convictions for palmistry and other species of fortune-telling from 1st March, 1901, till 30th June, 1904, in London and Birmingham, respectively.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): During the period in question there were in the Metropolitan Police District sixteen prosecutions of the nature indicated by the hon. Member and thirteen convictions. In Birmingham there were fourteen prosecutions and five convictions, with two cases still pending.

MR. JOHN CAMPBELL: What class of people were prosecuted. Were they sixpenny, or two or three guinea fee-takers?

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I will see if I can get the information for the hon. Member.

The Alleged Mutiny on board ss. "Homewood"—Composition of the Crew.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received any report from His Majesty's Consul at the Port of Brest, France, with regard to the alleged mutiny on board the British steamer "Homewood"; and whether he can state how many of the sailors and firemen were foreigners, and what were their nationalities, and also to state whether these men could speak and understand the English language.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Yes, Sir, I have received a report from His Majesty's Consul at Brest in regard to a disturbance on board the "Homewood." There was no mutiny. One member of the crew assaulted another, and when the master attempted to handcuff the offender he was attacked by two of the dockers who were working on board the vessel. Members of the crew came, however, to the assistance of the master and protected him against further assault. The crew (other than officers) of the "Homewood," when the Articles were opened at Antwerp, consisted of four Germans, four Swedes, two Belgians, one Norwegian, one Swiss, one Turk, and two British. I have no information as to their knowledge of English.

MR. NANNETTI: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether these men understood the English language.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I do not think that is necessary. They seem, under the circumstances, to have behaved very well.

Tuberculosis By-laws.

MR. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for the St. Patrick Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state how many, and what, local authorities have adopted the model by-laws on tuberculosis issued by the Board; and whether, in the event of the sanitary authority refusing to adopt the model by-laws, there is any means of compelling them to do so.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. WALTER LONG, Bristol, S.): I presume that the hon. Member has in view the Model Regulations issued by my Department for the guidance of local authorities in framing regulations under the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885. Since 1899, when the present Model Regulations were issued, 583 series have been made by councils of boroughs and urban and rural districts, and they are for the most part based on the model. I am not empowered to compel local authorities to adopt the Model Regulations if they do not think fit to do so.

Inspection of Meat.

MR. LUNDON: On behalf of the hon. Member for the St. Patrick Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state if the medical officers of health who are charged with the duty of judging meat alleged to be affected with tuberculosis have any special qualification for this position, or whether they have passed any examination in public health; and whether he will consider the necessity of issuing by-laws for their guidance with a view of protecting the private property of the traders in native meat and preventing the detrimental effect of unnecessary confiscation upon the producers of home meat.

MR. WALTER LONG: I am advised that the training which every registered medical practitioner must have received as a student is sufficient to render him competent to detect tuberculosis in a carcase. As every medical officer of health must be a registered medical practitioner, it is not necessary for the purpose mentioned in the Question that he should possess any special qualification. Circulars were issued by my Department in March, 1899, and September, 1901, drawing attention to the principles which should be observed in the inspection of tuberculous carcases, and I do not think I need take any further action in the matter at the present time.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Is it not the fact that many of the inspectors have no qualifications whatever for this work.

MR. WALTER LONG was understood to reply that that observation would not apply to medical officers of health to whom the Question on the Paper referred, but it was the case that some of the inspectors were in no way qualified.

Kilrusheightey School Teacher's Salary.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Resident Commissioner of National Education in Ireland wrote on the 23rd March last to the Very Rev. John Melvin, parish priest, manager of Kilrusheightey National School, county Sligo, informing him that the Commissioners would be surcharged by the Auditor-General if the salary of the principal teacher of the school was increased by giving him credit for the sum of £7 14s. 6d., which he had earned for tuition in agriculture within the three years ended 31st March, 1900; if so, will he explain to the House the circumstances under which the Resident Commissioner endeavours to transfer to the Auditor-General the responsibility of the Commissioners of National Education for a failure to comply with Rule 200 in calculating the consolidated income of the principal teacher of the school mentioned; has this case been submitted to the Auditor-General; and is that official entitled to supervise the Commissioners' interpretation of Rule 200.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The reply to the first inquiry is in the affirmative. Payments made by the Commissioners in such cases are governed by regulations which have been approved by Government and the Treasury, and are audited by the Controller and Auditor-General, who is authorised by statute to surcharge any payment made in contravention of the regulations. The case in question has not come under the notice of the Controller and Auditor-General because no payment was made.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland were bound, under Rule 200, to take into account all sums earned by teachers from State sources for work actually performed within the three years ended 31st March, 1904; that the principal teacher of Kilrusheightey (county Sligo) was paid a sum of £7 14s. 6d. for tuition in agriculture given within the period stated; that the manager of this school, Very Rev. John Melvin, P.P., has repeatedly insisted that that sum (£7 14s. 6d.) should have been taken into account by the Commissioners when fixing the teacher's consolidated income; and that the Commissioners have refused to take it into account; and, if so, will he say under what authority have the Commissioners departed in this case from the provisions of Rule 200; and has the manager any appeal from their decision.

MR. WYNDHAM; The period referred to in Rule 200 is the triennial period ended 31st March, 1900. Subject to this correction the reply to the first inquiry is in the negative. The consolidated incomes of teachers were calculated on emoluments actually paid within that period. The payment in the present instance was not so made, and in any case it was never contemplated by the Rules, as I have already explained, that grants covering services in respect of a period of six months should be continued in perpetuity under the form of consolidated income. The Commissioners reserved to themselves, with the approval of the Treasury, the right to give special consideration to cases in which any of the regulations in Rule 200 would operate inequitably. This right was exercised in a large number of cases at considerable additional expenditure. The claim of the Rev. Mr. Melvin was also several times considered by them, but they saw no reason for coming to the conclusion that it could be sustained.

Irish Intermediate Education—Committee of Inquiry.

MR. FLYNN (Cork County, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will say when was the Committee of Inquiry now investigating the working of the system of intermediate education in Ireland appointed; what are the terms of reference to the Committee; who are the gentlemen who constitute the Committee; what educational experience do they possess; what is the nature of the inquiries they are making; and who are the witnesses called, if any.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Committee was appointed on 2nd May. The inquiries are directed to the general conditions of the organisation of intermediate education in Ireland; its relations with primary and technical education; the staffing and equipment of schools; the allocation of the Board's funds; the training and salaries of teachers. The members of the Committee are Mr. F. H. Dale, an Inspector of Schools under the English Board of Education; and Mr. Stephens, late Inspector of Schools for the Victoria University, and now one of His Majesty's Inspectors of Schools. About eighty intermediate schools have been visited, as well as some of the training colleges. The Committee conferred with many educational authorities of different denominations and with teachers of schools.

MR. FLYNN: By what authority was the Committee appointed?

MR. WYNDHAM: By the authority of the Lord-Lieutenant.

Queen's College (Belfast) Professors.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state whether any appointments, outside their professional appointments, are held by the professor of English, the professor of chemistry, the professor of logic, and the professor of pathology, at Queen's College, Belfast; whether he can state if their college work is limited to five months in the year; and whether he has received any representations as to the necessity for the appointment of assistants at the public cost.

MR. WYNDHAM: The professors in question hold no appointments other than examinerships. The Clark Lectureship, conferred by Trinity College, Cambridge, is also held by the professor of English. So far from the work of the professors being limited, as suggested, to a period of five months, in the year, the professors in some cases are only able to obtain a vacation of six weeks. The reply to the last query is in the negative.

Mr. MACVEAGH: Is it the case that the sittings only extend over five months in the year?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I will deal with that in answer to another Question.

Irish Queen's Colleges.

Mr. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state in how many months of the year education is imparted at the Queen's College, Belfast, and for how many months of the year, including vacation periods, it is closed; and whether he can state if the periods of repose are similar at the Queen's College, Galway, and the Queen's College, Cork.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The period of the college session at Belfast, as at Galway and Cork, is regulated by statute and is the same in the case of each of these colleges. It commences on the third Tuesday in October and terminates on the second Saturday in June. Much of the so-called vacation between June and October is taken up with examinations of the Royal University, at which the professors and students are occupied.

Mr. MACVEAGH: Are they not paid extra in connection with these examinations?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I cannot say.

Lectures in Queen's College, Belfast.

Mr. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state how many courses of lectures, advertised to be delivered in the Queen's College, Belfast, on music and on sound, have been abandoned for want of audiences, and what public cost was entailed on those occasions in fees and otherwise.

Mr. WYNDHAM: No such courses of lectures were abandoned for the reason stated, or any other reason, and no public cost was entailed.

Westropp Estate, County Clare.

Mr. SHEEHY (Meath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will say what reply the Estates Commissioners have received to the request made to the Land Judge's Court on behalf of the tenants on the Westropp Estate, county Clare; and whether the property is to be sold in compliance with the request.

Mr. WYNDHAM: On receipt of the request, the Land Judge wrote to the Estates Commissioners reminding them that offers for purchase had been previously made to the tenants under the 40th Section of the Act of 1896, and refused by the majority of the tenants. The Land Judge also pointed out that at the time of the consideration of the Land Commission report upon which these offers were based, the tenants had the fullest opportunity of being heard, and the prices named were most carefully considered by the Land Judge. In these circumstances, the Judge did not deem it expedient at present that proceedings should be taken under the 7th Section of the Act of 1903.

Mr. SHEEHY: Can the right hon. Gentleman state what offer was made to the tenants by the Land Judge?

Mr. WYNDHAM: No, Sir.

In reply to a further Question Mr. Wyndham said the matter was one which deserved and should have his careful attention.

Glen (Kerry) Boat-Slip.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the state of the boat-slip at Glen, county Kerry; and, if so, whether, in view of the fact that the fishing season will shortly commence, the Congested Districts Board will complete the slip and undertake the construction of a breakwater.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The Board recently expended a sum of £360 on the extension of this boat-slip. The construction of a breakwater would cost many thousands of pounds, but no further expenditure than that already incurred is contemplated by the Board.

Kanturk Land Appeals.

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will explain why appeals in land cases from the Assistant Commissioner and from County Court Judges, which concern the Kanturk, county Cork, district, are heard in Killarney instead of Cork; and whether, in view of the additional expense to solicitors, tenants, and witnesses, as also the delay involved, the Land Commission will arrange to hear these appeals in Cork or Mallow, or other convenient centre in the county of Cork.

Mr. WYNDHAM: There is direct railway communication between Kanturk and Killarney and the former is nearer to Killarney than to Cork. Killarney is regarded as the most convenient centre for the hearing of appeals, and no additional expense, I am informed, has been placed upon the parties by having their cases heard in Killarney, which was selected to suit the public convenience.

Mr. FLYNN: Is it not possible to consult the convenience of those most concerned in these cases?

Mr. WYNDHAM: It is impossible to suit everybody's convenience.

Strabane Labourers' Cottage Scheme.

Mr. McFADDEN (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Henry McCool, of Druminany, Raphoe, county Donegal, in the year 1899 applied to the Strabane No. 2 Rural District Council for a labourer's cottage, on the ground that his house had been condemned by the medical officer of health as unfit for habitation; that the Local Government Board for Ireland wrote to Henry McCool on the 23rd July, 1901, that steps were being taken to carry out an improvement scheme under which he would be provided with a cottage; that in 1902 McCool was compelled to leave his house, on the ground that a labourer's cottage was about to be built on its site, and had to take lodgings in the house of a neighbour; that a labourer's cottage was built on the site of the old house and on its completion was given to a man named Porterfield who did not belong to the district at all; and whether, seeing that McCool has now got notice to leave the lodgings where he has resided since 1902 and cannot get accommodation in the district, the Local Government Board will direct the Strabane No. 2 Rural District Council to take steps to provide him with a cottage.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The statements in the Question are accurate, but they omit an important factor in the case—namely, that the cottage was originally applied for by Porterfield. The district council has decided to let the cottage to this man, and it appears that the council is now preparing a further scheme which includes a cottage for McCool.

Rae Estate, Kerry.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken by the Congested Districts Board for Ireland with a view to purchase the Rae Estate, Keel, county Kerry; what are the instructions given to the engineer who, since February last, has spent a few days on the estate; when will he be required to furnish his report; and whether he will be instructed to secure the voluntary co-operation of the tenants in preparing his report.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The Board is still in correspondence with the owners of this property. When it is in possession of certain information for which it has applied to the owners, it will consider the question of the purchase of the estate. The Chief Inspector has not yet visited the estate.

Irish Language for Irish Postal Officials.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he has received copies of resolutions passed by the county councils of Wexford, Meath, Dublin, and Tipperary (S.R.), by thirteen urban district councils, nine rural district councils, and fourteen boards of guardians in various parts of of Ireland, requesting to have Irish made a subject of examination for postal officials in Ireland, and to have a knowledge of Irish required in making appointments of postmasters and postmen; whether he is aware that in the official advertisement of the vacancy for the postmastership of Carnarvon the words, "a knowledge of Welsh is necessary," occur; and whether he proposes to have the resolutions of these elected councils in Ireland carried into effect.

THE POSTMASTER - GENERAL (Lord STANLEY, Lancashire, Westhoughton): I have received copies of resolutions passed by various local bodies in Ireland urging the adoption of Irish as a subject of examination for postal officials in Ireland, and the introduction of a rule requiring a knowledge of that language by all postmasters and postmen. The conditions under which Irish is used as a spoken or written language do not appear to me to be such as to render such a measure necessary. In certain districts of Wales a knowledge of Welsh is necessary; and this fact was mentioned in the advertisement of the vacancy in the postmastership of Carnarvon.

MR. BOLAND: If the noble Lord gets resolutions from every district council will he kindly consider the matter?

LORD STANLEY: Oh yes, I will consider it.

MR. JOYCE (Limerick): Will you consider it favourably?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Finance Bill will be taken on Monday?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Yes. On Monday and Tuesday.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): Has any fixture been made for the next stage of the Navy Estimates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): Are we to understand that the Licensing Bill will not be taken next week?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. I can only say that we shall take the Finance Bill on Monday and Tuesday.

NEW WRIT.

New Writ for the County of Salop (Western or Oswestry Division), in the room of the hon. George Ralph Charles Ormsby-Gore, now Baron Harlech, called up to the House of Peers.—(Sir A. Acland-Hood.)

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES.)

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Members from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures; Dr. MacDonnell, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Runciman, Mr. Channing, and Mr. William McKillop; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. Clancy, Mr. O'Shee, Mr. Lundon, Mr. Joseph Nolan, and Mr. McHugh.

Report to lie upon the Table.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had added to the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures, the following fifteen Members in respect of the Labourers (Ireland) Bill: Mr. Moore, Mr. Charles Craig, Mr. O'Doherty, Dr. Thompson, Mr. Joseph Devlin, Mr. Hayden, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. Kilbride Mr. Cullinan, Captain Donelan, Mr. Sheehan, Mr. Lonsdale, Mr. Sloan, Mr. Corbett, and Mr. O'Neill.

Report to lie upon the Table.

NEW BILLS.

ISLE OF MAN (CUSTOMS) BILL.

"To amend the Law with respect to Customs Duties in the Isle of Man," presented by Mr. Victor Cavendish; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 269.]

CRIMINAL ALIENS BILL.

"To make provision for the repatriation of Criminal Aliens," presented by Sir Howard Vincent; supported by Mr. Forde Ridley, Sir Carne Rasch, Sir Ernest Flower, Mr. Runciman, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Herbert Robertson, and Colonel Pilkington; to be read a second time upon Friday, and to be printed. [Bill 270.]

LICENSING BILL [3RD ALLOTTED DAY].

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4:—

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's) moved to omit the words from "confirming" to "county borough" in order to insert the words "the county licensing committee to confirm new licences, and any other power of that committee shall." The object of the Amendment, he said, was almost entirely consequent on the Amendments which had already been accepted by the Government limiting the compensation clauses of the Bill to existing licences. As the Bill was first adopted the compensation clauses applied to new licences. It was therefore necessary to provide that in the case of the non-county boroughs the county quarter sessions should consent to the grant of new licences; but now that the compensation clauses of the Bill only applied to existing licences, this necessity no longer existed and the provision which required consent to be given by quarter sessions might therefore be omitted. Non-county boroughs would retain exactly the same power which they had now over new licences. They would have the same confirming authority, viz., the whole body of magistrates or the special committee as the case might be. He thought that this Amendment would meet, at all events, if not entirely, in a very large degree, the Amendments which were on the Paper in the names of the hon. Members for Anglesey, Lancaster, Flint, and Huddersfield. As regarded county boroughs the Government, after having heard what had been said during the Second Reading and in the earlier stages of the Committee, had decided not to interfere with the present confirmation of new licences, so that the whole body of justices, acting for the borough, would continue to act as the confirming authority and need not, unless they wished to do so, appoint a special committee. So far as the county quarter sessions were concerned, they would appoint a committee, but the committee which they would appoint would be in substitution of the licensing committee which they now appointed and which now acted. Sub-section 1, as they proposed to amend it, was therefore limited to the provision necessary to transfer to quarter sessions the present statutory powers which were possessed by the licensing committee of quarter sessions for the purpose of confirming licences. It was really the same authority, but a new committee would have to be appointed, and they would deal with new licences as well as with the question of the extinction of licences which had been reported to them as redundant by the brewster sessions. The same committee in the county and the same body of justices in the county borough would deal both with the confirmation of new licences and with references from the licensing justices as to the renewal of existing licences. The Committee would see that the Government had gone very far to meet many of the suggestions which had been made both from non-county and county borough Members, and he trusted they would think that the proposals they had made were an improvement on the Bill. They certainly simplified the powers very much indeed, because they left, to a very much greater extent than was formerly proposed, the jurisdiction where it was before.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 8, to leave out from the word 'of' to the word 'be,' in line 10, and to insert the words, 'the county licensing committee to confirm new licences, and any other power of that committee shall."—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

Mr. HELME (Lancashire, Lancaster) said that on behalf of the interest represented by the non-county boroughs he desired to thank the Home Secretary for the consideration and courtesy with which he had received the deputations which had waited upon him. He reserved to the Report stage the raising of the question of non-county boroughs having powers equal to those conferred upon county boroughs where the population exceeded 25,000. In such boroughs the compensation area was sufficiently large and valuable to allow such powers to be exercised without any injury to the principle contained in the Bill.

Mr. LLOYD WHARTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon) said that hitherto the licensing bodies had put forward a claim for a new licence. They had sat on the county licensing committees and had made recommendations for new licences. The county licensing committee in dealing with the whole county had inquired into these cases and had either confirmed or rejected the original suggestions. Now, if he understood the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman rightly, the county licensing committee would cease to be the qua licensing authority, and the powers of the committee would be relegated to quarter sessions, who, he supposed, would delegate them again to the new committee, which would clear away difficulties that might arise from having two committees, one a licensing committee and the other what they might call a compensation committee. They had a provisional power given to county boroughs which, instead of sending their claims to the new licensing committees, would formulate their own licensing committees and would either confirm or reject the recommendations of the brewster sessions, so that there would be considerable access of power to justices in county boroughs.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) asked if it was made perfectly clear that quarter sessions could delegate their powers under Section 4 to the committee to be appointed under Section 5. He thought there was some danger it might be suggested there was no such power of delegation. Personally he was in favour of it.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir Edward Carson, Dublin University): Yes, I think it is quite clear.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: It will be the county licensing committee after all.

Sir EDWARD CARSON: Not the existing licensing committee but one in lieu of it.

Mr. MANSFIELD (Lincolnshire, Spalding), inquired whether, supposing the licensing justices refused an application for a new licence, quarter sessions or their committee would have power to override their decision and grant the new licence.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: No, quarter sessions cannot override their decision in such a case.

Mr. WHITLEY (Halifax) asked if the Government were prepared to insert provisions to ensure that the inhabitants of a district affected had full notice of any intention to apply for a new licence so that they might attend the Court and put forward their views. Every possible avenue for the expression of public opinion should be left open.

Sir EDWARD CARSON replied that under the law as it stood there was a very elaborate system of notice insisted on as a precedent to applications for new licences.

Question put, and negatived.

Words inserted.

Mr. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.) moved an Amendment to give power to quarter sessions to sanction or vary any conditions attached to a new licence under the provisions of the section. His object was to extend the powers of quarter sessions. A new licensing system was practically to be set up, and personally he thought it a considerable improvement on the present one. It was in fact much more elastic. He believed it would work satisfactorily provided that there was some power of controlling within reasonable limits the various conditions that might be attached to licences. The present power of quarter sessions only extended to confirming or not confirming; but if they were to extend the power of the licensing justices in the way proposed by the Home Secretary, he thought they must also make a corresponding extension of the powers of quarter sessions, which ought to have the power to refuse conditions attached to licences.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 11, after the word 'sessions' to insert the words 'and shall include the power to sanction any conditions attached to a new licence under the provisions of this section.'"—(Mr. Henry Hobhouse.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) said the point raised by his right hon. friend was one well worthy of consideration. His right hon. friend suggested that when new licences were granted there should be some power in quarter sessions so to vary the conditions imposed by local magistrates that there should be some kind of uniformity in the terms on which the new licences were granted. Personally he was rather in favour of leaving such liberty to the local magistrates as might produce a large variety of experiment in this matter. On the whole he was disposed to think that, instead of having a controversy between the local magistrates and quarter sessions as to the terms upon which in a given locality new licences should be granted, they might leave the power with the local magistrates. He thought they would have a very valuable series of experiments made, some of which would doubtless be abortive, but none of which, so far as he could see, would inflict injustice on individuals, because from the nature of the case a man who took a new licence knew the conditions under which he took it, and if he did not think those conditions were tolerable he had the liberty of refusing to enter into the contract.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) said he was not in favour of the Amendment, because he did not desire to see the authority of the local magistrates more circumscribed than it was at present. Quarter sessions might say to a licensee, "If you are not prepared to accept modifications in the sense that we desire we shall refuse to confirm the licence."

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE said that if quarter sessions had power to bargain with the licensee his object would be achieved; but it seemed to him they must either confirm or veto the licence. As the Government were not prepared to accept the Amendment he asked leave to withdraw it.

*MR. WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W. R., Spen Valley) moved the following proviso, "Provided that no new licence shall be granted before the 1st day of January, 1907." He regarded the provisions of the clause in regard to the granting of new licences as a considerable improvement on the original Bill, but he could not help feeling that the discussion on these important although somewhat crude proposals was being rushed. The fact that the Government had already altered their scheme showed the difficulty and complexity of the problem for the discussion of which they were only being allowed one day. He wished to recognise that the revised proposal of the Government was a genuine attempt to propound a bona fide scheme for the issue of new licences in the interests of the public. There was no trace of the brewer in this proposal, and he was, perhaps, a little strengthened in his support of it by the fact that the trade papers were strongly condemning it. The object of his Amendment was to relieve the licensing justices of the necessity of dealing with that very complicated and difficult problem just at the moment when they had the new reduction proposals on their hands. The justices under the revised clause would fix the price to be charged for a licence for a period of seven years; and he thought that when they had had a year or two's experience in dealing with the question of compensation for non-renewal they would have gathered a large amount of very useful information as to the value of a licence and the conditions which ought to be attached to it. They were framing the new licensing system somewhat in a hurry, and one advantage of deferring the granting of new licences for two years would be that the Government would have an opportunity of reconsidering the whole matter. Many difficult problems were connected with the granting of new licences. There was the question whether there should be a heavy licence fee, fixed according to population if they liked, which would keep down the number of licences simply by the amount which would have to be paid, or whether they should adopt a system under which persons should tender, stating how much they would give for a licence. For these and other reasons it would be well to postpone for two years the granting of new licences.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 8, at beginning, to insert the words 'No new licences shall be granted before the 1st day of January, 1907, and after that date.'"—(Mr. Whittaker.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL PILKINGTON (Lancashire, Newton) thought it would be a very great pity to interfere in any way with the discretion of the magistrates in the granting of new licences. The matter had been dealt with by the Home Secretary and the Solicitor-General with the greatest care and ability, and in his opinion the sooner the magistrates got to work the better. The hon. Member must not forget that many benches of licensing magistrates had already formulated schemes for a reduction in the number of licensed houses, and had obtained full particulars of the premises it was proposed to deal with, so that the pressure on them immediately after the passing of the Bill was not so great as he had suggested.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS dissented from the view of the hon. Member for the Spen Valley that the discussion was being rushed. He could not accept the Amendment. He had always had sympathy with the view that very few licences ought to be granted. But he did not see the necessity for the Amendment, because the magistrates would have the power to refuse to issue new licences for two years if they thought well to do so, and because, in the interest of growing districts which would require new licences to satisfy their needs, it would not be right to fetter the discretion of the magistrates.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester) feared that the Home Secretary had not appreciated the full force of the argument advanced by the hon. Member for the Spen Valley. What it was desired to point out was that in the administration of this great and complicated Act the magistrates would be overburdened with work, and, therefore, it was quite a reasonable suggestion to suspend the granting of new licences for two years, when the magistrates would have more time to give to the consideration of the matter. After all, the main object of the Bill was to reduce the number of drinking shops, and surely it was not a very drastic proposal to suggest that no new licences should be granted for two years. As a rule licensing justices were men who were engaged in other businesses, and it was not right to make too heavy calls on their time.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

"In page 3, line 11, to leave out from the word 'sessions' to end of sub-section."—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. WHITTAKER next moved to add at the end of the sub-section—"(1) No application for a new licence shall be received or considered by the justices of a licensing district unless and until they have issued a public notice that in their opinion a new licence is required in a particular locality, and they are prepared to receive applications for it." This was, he said, one of the recommendations in the Majority Report of the Royal Commission on Licensing, and he hoped, therefore, it would receive the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon. The proposal was a very simple one. His object was to save the magistrates from being badgered and worried by people coming continually with applications for new licences in the hope that some year they would influence a majority of the Court. It would be a very great advantage indeed if the magistrates had greater control and if it were left for them in the first place to decide where new licences were required and to invite suitable applications.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 11, at end, to insert the words '(1) No application for a new licence shall be received or considered by the justices of a licensing district unless and until they have issued a public notice that in their opinion a new licence is required in a particular locality and they are prepared to receive applications for it.' "—(Mr. Whittaker.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment. He had great doubts whether many persons would apply for new licences under the stringent conditions imposed by the Bill; but supposing in a new and growing district an hotel was built, was the owner to wait before he could apply for a licence until the justices of the licensing district had made up their minds about the necessity of a new licensed hotel in the locality? Was it not much better that the person applying for the licence should give evidence before the magistrates as to the necessity for such an hotel, and that on hearing that evidence the licensing magistrates should make up their minds as to whether or not they should grant the licence? The hon. Member must know that at present the greatest pains were taken to make known that an application for a licence had been lodged with the magistrates. There had to be publication of it in the papers for a month or more before the licence could be granted, and also on the site and on certain public buildings. Any member of the public had the power to come before the magistrates to object to the granting of the licence, and have his side of the case thrashed out. He could not see that anything would be gained by the Amendment.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) said that as he had placed on the Paper an Amendment with the same object but in another form, he wished to say a word or two in support of the proposal of his hon. friend. The Home Secretary had just said that it was undesirable to restrict the power of the licensing magistrates, and now they were told by the Solicitor-General that it was undesirable to extend the powers of the magistrates to represent their locality in dealing with this question of new licences. The magistrates were trusted with the duty of granting licences because they were supposed to be the most soberminded men in dealing with licences in their own locality; and they should be allowed to form their own judgment as to the time at which they should deal with the needs of their own district. He thought the Amendment was in the right direction, and it was supported by those authorities which the Government ought to respect.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick) said that the Amendment which he wished to move raised two questions of very great importance. One was as to the advisability of having some change in the system under which the liquor trade was to be carried on; and the other was that an opportunity should be given to public opinion to express itself through a representative public authority. Many who were interested in temperance reform had been for some time of opinion that one of the most hopeful directions in which that reform could be carried out was that of endeavouring to have a change in the system of the liquor trade. As at present carried on it was inevitable that the sale of liquor should be pushed to the utmost degree possible. And, whilst it was his object to eliminate this, his Amendment would not interfere in any way with the liberty of people who wished to obtain alcoholic liquor. His object was to discourage the system of pushing the sale of liquor. He knew, of course, that the Amendment was open to one criticism, that if they got rid of the incentive to drink for the good of the landlord or the good of the house, it was only to substitute the incentive to drink for the good of the parish. That was a possible danger to which the system was open, but he would point out that, in his Amendment, there was nothing to restrict the disposal of the profits. It would be for purposes so wide—purposes of general utility that there would be no incentive to push the sale of liquor in any particular locality. The Amendment had been drawn in such a way as to guard against any such danger as he had described. After having got rid of the incentive to push the sale of liquor, he provided that the profits should be devoted to counter-attractions to the public-house. [AN HON. MEMBER: To fountains?] What was in his mind when he spoke of counter-attractions was that in every village there should be a place of resort—a public hall or club for social entertainment, where village societies could meet and spend their time in interesting and profitable discussions. "Counter-attractions," of course, was not quite the full description of what he meant. Public halls were in themselves eminently desirable, whether there was a public-house close by or not. The phrase had been drawn intentionally wide, because it would include fountains up to the highest form of scientific education.

As to the second most important point in the Amendment, it was to bring in a representative authority. Now, he quite saw that they could not bring in a representative authority in such a way as to confuse the administration of the licensing authority. But, if the local authority were given no administrative power whatever, and only an opportunity of passing resolutions in regard to the issue of new licences, he thought that might be done in such a way as not to lead to confusion in administration. Under this Bill it was impossible to change the administrative authority from the justices to a representative authority; and if his Amendment would entail anything of that kind he admitted that it would be against the principle of the Bill. At the same time he, and those who thought with him, had never looked upon the justices as the ideal authority to decide all questions in regard to licences; and just as they were beginning to have some hope of a change in the system, their hopes had been dashed by the introduction of this Bill. He wished the introduction of a representative authority, because he believed that in recent years public opinion had been ripening in regard to temperance reform, and had been keenly investigating possible methods of such reform. The Prime Minister himself had admitted that there was some hope in liberty of experiment in this matter. He entirely agreed that foolish experiments might be made; still in liberty of experiment there was really some hope of temperance reform. But there could be no liberty of experiment unless some opportunity was given for the expression of public opinion. He insisted that that opportunity of giving expression to the desire of the people for temperance reform could be afforded without conflicting with the administration of the licensing authority set up by the Bill. If it were the case, as everybody admitted, that the liquor trade and excess in drinking was a real national danger, and if that danger were greatly increased by leaving the trade in private hands, surely no opportunity of introducing a change in the present licensing system should be neglected. Excess was the real national danger, and if that danger were greatly increased, as it must be, by leaving the trade in private hands, and if it were the case that private hands had literally got the country by the throat, surely no opportunity of introducing a change of system in the future should be ignored.

So far as existing licences were concerned, the Amendment did not refer to them, but, where the creation of new licences was concerned, public opinion should be given the greatest possible opportunity of starting new and improved systems. The Prime Minister spoke somewhat disparagingly of temperance reformers as a hopeless body because they were never agreed. If they took too extreme a view of the matter it was difficult to get agreement, but he thought there were many creeks and inlets into which a favourable tide would flow if they only dug a channel for it. He wanted to dig a channel for it in that Amendment in which public opinion might flow. The real hope was not so much in a great general movement as in the fact that they would have one community more progressive than another, which afforded a practical way of advancing to which they should give every facility. He wanted any progressive communities to have an opportunity of having their say, and experiment to have a fair trial, in the hope of a better system of control of the liquor trade. Even if the number of new licences must be for many years comparatively small, and as he saw in the clause as moved by the Government nothing of the hand of the brewer, and no desire to tie licensing authorities down with regard to the new system, he would ask the Government whether they could not favourably consider his Amendment, which introduced the representative authority, and so gave facilities for the expression of public opinion without conflicting with the administrative powers of their own licensing authority, and to say whether it would not be desirable that they should give some invitation to local authorities to take steps in the direction of putting new licences, at any rate, under a better system than that which had hitherto had the monopoly of the trade.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 13, at end, to insert the words 'provided that a local authority may, by resolution, declare that no new on-licence shall be so granted or confirmed in respect of premises within their area except to a company or association of persons formed for the purpose of devoting any profits (or any such proportion of profits as may be specified in the resolution) to public purposes and complying with regulations made for the purpose by the Secretary of State, and any such resolution shall have effect accordingly.'"—(Sir Edward Grey.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said there was a great deal in the general observations of the right hon. Baronet with which, as the Committee knew, he was in sympathy; but he did not think it would be desirable to adopt the Amendment which he had put upon the Paper; nor did he think that Amendment really carried out the general principles which the right hon. Baronet had laid down in his speech. He would not go into the question of how the money which could be derived from the sale of liquor in a parish or district could be applied for the entertainment and improvement of the inhabitants. He remembered the late Lord Salisbury suggested that if they wanted to amuse a parish the best way was by giving a circus rather than by giving a parish council; and he would venture to suggest to his hon. friend behind, who made interjectory interruption in the speech of the right hon. Baronet, that probably circuses would be more effective for that particular purpose than the fountain which his hon. friend would regard apparently as the substitute in this case. He did not gather that the intention of the right hon Baronet was to substitute a non-intoxicating for an intoxicating beverage, but rather to see if any profits made out of the monopoly value could be transferred to some public purpose. There were many temperance reformers who would regard that as a very serious blow to their own particular views as to how the cause of temperance could be best advanced. He neither shared their apprehensions in that matter nor did he share to the full some of the hopes which the right hon. Baronet expressed as to the substitution of companies like those indicated in the Amendment for the present system. He must honestly say he thought there had been an exaggeration in much temperance literature as to the degree of alcoholic consumption which was due to what was called pushing the sale of drink. He had not much experience in those matters, but his own impression was that the people drank in public-houses because they wanted to drink, and not because the liquor was pressed upon them by the publican. There might be, and no doubt were, especially in country districts, cases in which the sale might be pressed to the great detriment of the locality and of the individuals who fell a prey to that temptation; but that the great bulk of the drinking in this country was regulated by the pressure put upon the consumer by the publican, and not by the pressure put upon the publican by the consumer, he had very great doubts. It was not really those considerations, which were subsidiary, on which he based his objection to that Amendment.

That Amendment was recommended to the Committee because it introduced the public opinion of the locality, and enabled it to pronounce in favour of a particular form of experiment in regard to the sale of alcoholic liquors. He quite understood the policy, though he did not agree with it, or think it would be desirable, at all events in the existing conditions, to say that every question connected with drinking facilities, so long as injustice were not inflicted on individuals, should be left to the locality itself. That was an intelligible but probably not an expedient policy; but he did not think the limited form proposed by the Amendment was consistent either with sound theory or practice. It would only allow the local authority to intervene in that question in one particular form and in favour of one particular kind of experiment. That seemed to him illogical and inconsistent with the general principles they desired to lay down, and also inimical to that other liberty of experiment which he regarded as one of the most valuable results of Clause 4 in its present shape. Under the Amendment the liberty of the local authority would be absolutely restricted to saying aye or no to that one particular question.

SIR EDWARD GREY: If the Govern- would insert the wider and larger Amendment I should be delighted to withdraw this. I thought, being small, it might be acceptable.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he thought if they were going to give power to the locality at all they should give the locality freedom all round. But they had gone throughout on the hypothesis that they were to interfere as little as possible with the magisterial management. That was the view embodied in the Bill, and it had received its most violent expression from hon. Gentlemen opposite. They had been obliged to change the magisterial authority in order to carry out the scheme of compensation, but where they could leave it alone they had done so. He did not think it would be wise in Clause 4 alone of the Bill to bring in for the first time the local authority as settling the precise kind of experiment which should be tried. He was not sure they would be well suited to carry that out, and it would be both illogical and imprudent in any case to say, "We cannot trust you with the whole decision on all the points that arise, but you are to have the power to say aye or no to the one particular form of experiment." He thought the public-house trust system a most proper experiment, and one well worthy of trial. Whether it was going to succeed, and going gradually to supplant other methods, he was not rash enough to prophesy, but it was an experiment which had been supported with the most earnest intentions of dealing with some of the evils in the country, and full liberty to try it with regard to new licences was left under the clause as they had drafted it. He would venture to suggest, however, they ought not to lay it down that in this particular, and in this particular alone, the local authorities should be dragged in, and be permitted to give a veto on any other than one particular form of experiment among the many forms of experiment which were open to the magistrates to try. For these reasons he hoped the Committee would agree with the Government in refusing to accept this limitation.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE thought it was unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman could not meet the invitation of the right hon. Member for Berwick, and leave the whole matter in the hands of the local authorities. He considered local authorities should have greater powers in this matter than they had at present. The door, of course, was closed so far as existing licences were concerned, but they ought to have a locus standi whenever application was made for a new licence. At present the local authority had no right to appear before the magistrates, or instruct counsel to place the case for the locality officially before the Court of quarter sessions. It had been decided by the House of Lords that if a watch committee employed counsel for the purpose of presenting its views on a licensing question, the money so spent should be disallowed. He would suggest that where a new licence was applied for, notice should be given to the local authority of the district, and that the authority should be able to appear before the licensing magistrates and quarter sessions. It would be practically useless in London, for instance, to advertise these notices in the local newspapers, because they had a very poor circulation, and probably not one-tenth of the population ever saw them. The notice should be sent to the authority, and appear on the agenda paper of their meetings and be considered. He agreed that drinking did not depend on the pressure of the publican so much as it did on a man's sense of honour. A man who had nowhere else to spend the evening, and who had any sense of honour, felt that he could not sit in a public-house all the evening for 2d. That was the sort of pressure that existed. He felt he was not welcome if he did not spend, and therefore he continued to drink and spend his money. A man ought to be able to feel that he was just as welcome if he did not spend his money as if he did. A man was not scowled at in his club if he did not spend his money, and that was one of the elements of these great trusts. This question of licensing would never be settled except by means of experiment, and he thought they should not only be allowed to experiment, but encouraged to do so. But what was a good experiment in one district might be a bad experiment for another. He knew districts in Wales where prohibition was a success, but there were others where, if prohibition were tried, a wholesale defiance of the law would follow. The local authority would be much more likely to experiment, and therefore he would ask the Prime Minister to consider whether some means could not be devised which would give greater elasticity with regard to new licences. Not much harm would, at any rate, be done if the local authority were brought in, and it would test how they would set to work. In some districts it would be quite possible that the whole system of licensing would be recast, but that could only be done by trusting local opinion.

MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow) thought the Committee, at all events, were entitled to ask that the Amendment should be sufficiently clearly worded to ensure that the new licensed houses should be so managed that extra profits should not go to the brewers. It was only human nature that the brewers and distillers should endeavour to sell as much liquor as they possibly could, because it was their living. That was the result of the present system. It also had the effect of increasing the sale of inferior and doctored liquor, which ruined people's health and increased the craving for drink, a result from which the poor were the chief sufferers, because this inferior liquor was sold at a low price. The huge mistake that had been made in the past afforded a strong reason why every care should be taken against any such mistake in the future. As a loyal supporter he appealed to the Government to make it, as far as possible, certain that under all future licences it should not be in the interests of either owners or managers of licensed premises to increase the sale of beer or spirits. He hoped the Liberal Party, when they returned to power with serried ranks and gigantic battalions, would find a way of dealing with grocers' licences, which it was generally admitted had had the effect of teaching the women of England to drink.

SIR ROBERT REID said the Committee were now engaged in remodelling the licensing system so far as new licences were concerned, and that in itself was a matter of extreme importance. The Amendment proposed that in one direction the local authority should have power to require a particular experiment to be tried. That experiment was not municipalisation, but disinterested management, and under it a man would be able to enter a licensed house as a place of recreation, without feeling that he was obliged to spend more than he could afford. There was nothing in the idea of providing counter-attractions that ought to excite derision. The harder the life of the people, the more need was there for amusement and diversion, and the provision of that relaxation without the necessity to drink was an object of which every sensible man must thoroughly approve. Existing organisations for this purpose had done much good already, and with the experience they had secured they would doubtless do better in the future. The objection of the Prime Minister was not so much to the principle as to the empowering of the local authority to require the experiment to be tried, but the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman urged his objection rather gave the idea that he was not altogether beyond persuasion or pressure. The suggestions of the hon. Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs, that the local authority should be given a locus standi in the matter, would not do all that was required; but his further proposal that the relations between the local authority and the licensing authority should be considered was well worth attention. He would join his hon. friend in urging the Government to see whether something could not be done to give the local authority some potent voice—a consultative voice, if nothing more—in the granting of new licences. The field was absolutely open. Personally, he would like to supersede the justices by a complete scheme of local option. There was no chance of that, however, at present, but was it not possible to harmonise local opinion with the authority and power of the licensing justices? The question could not be properly discussed on the present occasion, but he hoped that before the Report stage the Government would consider whether they could do anything to assist in that direction.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said that one would imagine, from the discussion, that no regard had been had in the drafting of this clause for the interests of the experiment to which reference had been made. As the Prime Minister had stated, that experiment was a most valuable one, though whether it would eventually succeed was another matter. But the Committee must not be under the impression that the Government were not fostering that experiment. Under the proposal of the Home Secretary, power was to be given to the justices to attach "such conditions as they think best adapted for preventing any private person from obtaining any benefit for any monopoly value of the licence." That meant that the justices could attach such conditions as they pleased as to any proportion of profits being handed over for public purposes. There was to be no private gain in the matter. That provision would to a large extent help the trust experiment, because it was hardly conceivable that any private individual for a commercial speculation would accept such a proposition. It might happen, however, that an association carried on on non-dividend-earning lines might fail, and then the trust would come to an end, and the private individual would have to be set up again. The right hon. Baronet asked the Committee to go a step further, and empower the local authority to say that only to such a trust as was willing to agree to pay over the profits for public purposes would they grant new licences. That was an absolutely impracticable and impossible proposition. It might, in practice, amount to local option. In a new neighbourhood it was only as a matter of speculation that a hotel would be built. A trust was hardly likely to enter into such a speculation, so that the local authority would practically be empowered to say that no such hotel or refreshment room should be built. The same argument would apply to railway refreshment rooms, which were frequently carried on not for profit, but simply for the convenience of passengers. The right hon. Baronet would probably admit that in reality he was trying to introduce the thin end of the wedge of local option—a principle to which the Unionist Party had never in any way lent its support. To introduce that principle to the extent suggested in this Amendment would be a very serious matter. It might be a good or bad thing, but it could not be introduced into a Bill of this kind without having far-reaching consequences. A proposal had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Carnarvon to give the local authority a locus standi, but that was really the same principle as local option. In the case of an application for a new licence any member of the public might come in and object, or any member of the council. He regarded this Amendment as the thin end of the wedge for local option, and it would have more far-reaching consequences than it appeared at first sight to indicate.

Mr ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.) said the Solicitor-General had presented them with a new form of the simile of the thin end of the wedge, but the right hon. Gentleman could not have had in his mind at the time the legislation of his own Government in regard to Scotland.

What did the Government do in regard to Scotland? They actually gave direct representation to the local authority, and last year that principle was actually carried into effect in regard to Scotland. The Solicitor-General had asked what about hotels and railway stations? If the Government would accept the Amendment in substance and in spirit there would be no difficulty in moulding it into a form which would prevent any such cases of special hardships as those he had mentioned. The Solicitor-General asked what would happen supposing there were no trusts in the district prepared to undertake the matter? He did not think that was a very probable case, and a local authority under those circumstances would not pass any such resolution. If they did pass such a resolution it would be a clear indication of their view, in which one would imagine they were supported by the opinion of the locality, that it would be better not to have any public-houses at all rather than have them carried on merely for private profit under demoralising conditions. He doubted whether they would find any local authority, if there were no trusts, which would consider that it was fulfilling its obligations under this proviso by taking such a step. Let them clearly understand whether it was the opinion of the Government that this particular proposal should not be accepted here in England, and that local authorities as such should have no voice of any sort or kind and no power of remonstrance in its official capacity in regard to this great question. It had been determined in the House of Lords that local authorities could not lawfully expend the borough funds upon licensing appeals and that was a monstrous state of the law. He did not think there was any duty which could more properly be cast upon local authorities, and in the performances of which they could more rightly and justly resort to the rates, than that of expressing before the licensing justices what the general opinion of their district was in regard to public-house accommodation.

*MR. TALBOT (Oxford University) said he thought it was agreed on both sides of the House that the authority dealing with licensing questions should be the justices. He never could see why a distinction should be drawn between the justices acting in one place and the same justices acting in another place. This Amendment would prevent the justices from granting a new licence if the local authority said the licence must only be granted on the trust principle, because then the licensing justices were not to be allowed to grant that licence upon any other principle. That seemed to him to be interfering with the discretion of the magistrates which he wished to maintain. He would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that the feeling upon this matter of licensing was not always on one side. From experience in his own county he could state that local opinion in favour of licensing was much stronger than local opinion on the other side, as expressed at the petty sessions and quarter sessions. He had often had great difficulty in persuading his colleagues to take the views he held against the granting of new licences because public opinion as expressed in Court was often on the side of licensed houses. The other day he was sitting as chairman of a licensing committee, and they had an application from a town in Kent to be made what was known as "a populous place," which allowed more time for drinking in the evening. Not without difficulty it was shown that there was another side to the question and the licensing committee took the bold line, and, in the face of all the local opinion, which seemed to preponderate on the other side, they determined to deny this boon. He mentioned that to show that local opinion was not always on the temperance side.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid) said the right hon. Gentleman opposite had given instances where local opinion had been expressed unfavourable to the temperance cause, but he did not think that argument would apply to the local authority. They could always get influential persons to give their individual opinion in one direction or the other, but if they trusted the local authority, which had the responsibility of acting not merely for themselves but for those they represented, it would in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred express the real wishes of the locality.

The Solicitor-General had directed his criticism chiefly to the particular form of the Amendment, but his right hon. friend had stated his willingness to amplify his Amendment in any way which would induce the Government to support it. The valuable part of the Amendment was the suggestion that they should bring into play in dealing with new licences the intervention of the local authority. It was quite true that, theoretically, any one had power to appear before the licensing justices, but all those who had had experience of licensing justices knew that the representations made either by petition, through the chairman of a public meeting, or by means of a committee, were really not allowed to have the influence they deserved before the local justices. In days gone by it was decided in many cases not to permit petitions to be presented, and they were simply placed upon the table. He wished to remind the Prime Minister that this was the only part of the Bill in which this proposal could properly be made. Here they were dealing with licences that might be granted in the future, and they said that the local authority should have some locus standi in the determination of the questions which arose. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to give very full power in the case of public-house trusts, but something might be done to introduce the local bodies. His hon. and learned friend had suggested that they should have some locus standi before the justices, and it was, he understood, his intention to move an Amendment dealing with that matter. It would not be denied by anybody on the other side of the House that it would come well within the proper power of a local authority, at any rate, to make some representation in regard to this matter. The local authority were entrusted with the care of the health of the people, and they had to police the district, and surely it was not too much to ask that they should have the right to make representations to the justices, and that they should be placed in such a position that the justices would not be able to brush them on one side entirely in connection with any representations they might make. The Solicitor-General had stated that notice of an ample kind had to be made to many people before an application for a new licence could be made. He thought it would be well now to determine that notice should be given to the local authority. If that were done the public authority would deal with the matter and determine to do something with regard to it. He would make it the duty of the local authority to consider a proposed application for a new licence, to determine one way or other with regard to it, and to make a representation of their views to the justices. If Parliament declared that the local authorities themselves should consider these very important questions, and make representations regarding them, the justices would feel for the first time the real force which ought to attach to the opinions of the representatives of the people. He entirely approved of the new Clause 4 so far as it went, but he hoped something would be put in to enable local authorities to make representations to the justices.

Mr. CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston) said it was very desirable that the local authority should have power to advise in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University said he agreed with the speeches on both sides. He found himself in the unhappy position of disagreeing with both parts of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He disagreed with the view that the local authority should not have any power of intervention, and he disagreed also with the very sanguine hope formed as to the experiment which the trusts were carrying out. Mr Charles Booth, no mean experimenter, had experimented with five houses, and his report was to the effect that the idea that a manager could decrease the alcoholic trade was disproved. A friend with whom he had a conversation informed him that he had been told by one of the trust managers lately, "If I offer my customers tea and coffee they are fit to kill me." If they had a publican carrying on his business for his own private profit with all the interest he used to have at stake, under a bench of magistrates, active and vigilant in their supervision over him, they got as efficient a means of carrying on the business as they were likely to have through a manager. A good deal had been said as to the elimination of the element of private profit, but people did not work for profit alone. They worked for success and they became as enthusiastic about success as about profit. He knew of two prohibition areas in the neighbourhood of London where the population entirely appreciated the prohibition. Whenever it was proposed to open a public-house on the borders of these areas the people were prepared with practical unanimity to sign petitions against it. He had received letter after letter from a public-house trust, urging him to have a trust public-house in one of these areas. He maintained that their desire to have a public-house in one of these areas where there was no liquor sold at present, and where the people did not want liquor to be sold, did not arise from love of temperance, which might have been the original cause of forming the trust, but to that love of success which took hold of a man whenever he engaged in a business enterprise. He had intervened in the debate to express his strong feeling that the hope attached to this kind of work was very apt to be disappointed.

*MR. WHITTAKER said he was very strongly in favour of power being given to local authorities to make representations to the justices. He had not seen his way to support the Amendment of his right hon. friend. He was not in favour of entrusting the licensing system to the local representative authorities, because he did not want to see this liquor business introduced into municipal elections. He thought the influences of the liquor traffic in municipal elections would be all to the bad. He could imagine the dining, and otherwise influencing, to which the members of local authorities would be subjected. He would like to see some means devised whereby they would get the opinion of the public direct. He did see a good deal of advantage, in suitable localities, of eliminating the matter of private interests in the sale of liquor. The Prime Minister had suggested that there was practically nothing in the contention that the publican pushed the sale of drink. If the right hon. Gentleman would study the tied house system of the country, he would find how great was the number of publicans who were turned out because they had not pressed the sale of liquor and had not sold enough. If it were not to induce people to go in and buy liquor, why had licence-holders spent so much money to make their places attractive? If the element of private profit could be got rid of a great deal would be done to shorten hours as had been done in Norway. Much had been accomplished in the way of providing parks and playgrounds for the outdoor enjoyment of the people. But they were apt to forget that a majority of working people could only enjoy these places for a short time. He suggested that there should be provided "indoor parks," in the shape of free clubs and places of recreation, altogether disconnected with places of worship or instruction, and conducted with the utmost freedom, and quite clear of liquor. It was the social instinct which brought men together in the public-houses, and if such clubs as he had suggested were established much could be done to meet the great evil of drinking clubs which were springing up up and down the country. To close public-houses and yet allow drinking clubs to spring up would be to make very little headway indeed. The only way to grapple with the drinking club was to provide counter-attractions under the management of local authorities. He was very much attracted by the idea of getting the money to provide these counter-attractions from the liquor trade

His objection to the trusts associated with the name of Lord Grey was, first of all, that they brought very definite and potent pressure to bear in applications for new licences, thereby increasing the number of licences. They brought pressure of a potent kind to bear, because those connected with the trusts were all influential noblemen and gentlemen in their localities. These noblemen and gentlemen waited upon the bench of magistrates and urged that licences should be granted. In that way they could bring a pressure to bear which no private individual could do. Their contention was that all they asked for was that if the justices were prepared to grant a licence, the licence should be granted to them. But in practice they were pressing for licences in districts where there were already numerous licences; and consequently they were a very potent influence aiming at the increase of public-houses. His second objection was that the money was to be used for local purposes. That was a species of bribery to the local justices to grant a licence. If the profits were to be used to endow an hospital, a new library, or a nurse, it would be a very great inducement to grant an additional licence which would not otherwise be granted. The right hon. Baronet suggested that the gifts should be distributed over a wide area; but there was nothing of that in the Amendment.

The Solicitor General had referred to the complications which might ensue. He agreed that the many difficulties surrounding this proposal of the right hon. Baronet were too extensive to be discussed on this Amendment. One point of importance not mentioned in the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet, or in the amended clause the Government had put on the Paper, was the rate of interest that was to be allowed to these public-house trusts. He could see that a 5 per cent. investment might become very attractive indeed, especially if there was a tinge of philanthropy connected with it; and that the investor persuaded himself that he was thereby working in the direction of temperance reform. He was quite in favour of wide-spread local experiments; but they should be made under safeguarded conditions. He thought that disinterested management of public-houses would be of little value anywhere unless the company or the local authority had the control of all the licensed houses in the locality. A single house with disinterested management would have no value whatever. Before they could embark on the principle of disinterested management they ought to have a very well thought-out scheme; and such a scheme could not be introduced into this Bill. The Amendment did not propose that licences should be granted to a municipality, and he was glad to note that, because he believed it would be fatal. To grant licences to a municipality would be jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire. It was because the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet introduced in the crudest way the possibility of the element of public profit out of the sale of liquor that he much regretted that he could not see his way to support it.

SIR EDWARD GREY said he had moved his Amendment in the hope that the Government might see their way to accept it. It had been drafted on a limited scale in the anticipation that the Government would think it possible to admit it into the rather close meshes they had drawn round their Bill. But as the Government would not accept the small experiment which he had suggested he would not press his Amendment to a division. However, he felt very strongly that the local representatives were not to have any say at all in the granting of licences. The Solicitor-General said that this was the thin end of the wedge of local option. Well, in a sense it was, if local option was used in a wide sense, and not in that of local veto. He did not know why the thin end of the wedge should not be inserted here as well as in the Transvaal, which was not a highly democratic community. He had no desire to press this particular Amendment to a division; but he thought the sense of the House ought to be taken on the question of whether the representative authority was to have any say or any interest whatever in the direction of a trade which was admitted to be one of great danger.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton) said that the ideal of the hon. Member for Spen Valley was a land in which there should be no public-houses. His ideal was a land where there were enough public-houses. The question before the Committee was whether they were to have public-houses managed by trusts from philanthropic motives. He thought the Prime Minister rather under-estimated the power of the managers of tied houses in pushing the sale of drink. The tied house system had enormously increased during the last twenty years. In the old days a publican had a sort of pride in his business. It was a kind of a social institution; not a mere money-making establishment. Under the new system there was a decrease of the places in the public-houses where a man could sit down and quietly enjoy his evening. He thought if the Prime Minister, who did not seem to travel abroad much, were to go over to the Continent, he might see, for instance in France, what an ideal public-house was. There a man could sit all the evening, and write his letters, and have his glass of beer, or cup of coffee, and feel comfortable. But that could not be done in a tied house. His own opinion was that the local authority should have, in questions of granting new licences, not an authoritative position, but a consultative position. From a practical business point of view, he thought that a new licence should be sold by auction. In that way a very large sum of money would be obtained for public purposes. There ought to be some elasticity for experiments in a new system of licensing; but no bench of licensing magistrates would sanction these experiments unless they had the strengthening advice of the local authorities. Therefore, the local authority ought to be able to express the feeling of the community as a whole in regard to new licences. The Prime Minister said that any one could appeal to the licensing magistrates, but he could only do so individually and not as one speaking for the community. He urged on the Prime Minister to allow the local authority to have a consultative voice in the granting of a new licence.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) said that a great deal had been urged that afternoon as to the advantage of experiments being made on a new licensing system on right lines. He thought that the Amendment of his right hon. friend would fairly ensure that experiments might be made on trust lines, but it did not leave the way open to the adoption of a high licence system. It was said that under the Government scheme high licences would be possible. But, although high licences might, to a certain extent, destroy the monopoly, they would not promote temperance, because the man who had to pay a high licence would press the sale of liquor even more than a man who only had to pay a low licence. He would support the Amendment, not in the interests of the trusts, but because he did not believe that the Government scheme was on the right lines. His hon. friend had referred to trusts; but there was one variety of trust which had not been mentioned. That was the village trust started by miners in villages in Scotland, and run by them under extraordinarily difficult circumstances but with great financial success. He admitted that that was rather a dangerous form of trust, especially where a village was deriving a large income from the public-house. It would be far better if the Government recognised the trust system, and provided that the profits should be spread over a large area and not concentrated in one hard-drinking village. It was time that the whole system should be put on a better thought-out basis than that on which it now rested. These drinking clubs were extending from Scotland to the North of England, and they were on the highway to similar village trusts there to those which existed in Scotland.

MR. OSMOND WILLIAMS (Merionethshire) said he wished to support the Amendment. The principle of legislation in this country for years had been in the direction of decentralisation. The Bill, however, laid an axe to the root of local control and removed any power from the man on the spot, transferring it to a distant body whose local knowledge was of necessity extremely imperfect. The Home Secretary stated that quarter sessions would be an impartial tribunal. He had attended quarter sessions for thirty years, and during recent years he had had the honour of presiding over the Court; but, although he had the greatest respect for quarter sessions, he could not subscribe to the sweeping statement of the Home Secretary. Why go through the farce of asking the local justices to act at all? Why not make quarter sessions the sole authority? A more wanton insult to the local justices could not be imagined; and the public would be quite ready to lay hold of it.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE moved an Amendment providing that no new licence should be granted until at least three weeks notice of the hearing of the application had been given to the local authority in the area in which the public-house was situated, and the justices had considered all representations made to them by the local authority either in writing or at the hearing of the application. His object was to give a locus standi to the local authority, to allow it to make a full report as to the circumstances of the case, and to make suggestions to the justices so as to assist them in coming to a conclusion with reference to the terms on which they should grant a licence. The local authority was responsible for law and order and for the expense which new licences would throw upon the district, and surely they should be able to appear before the licensing bench and express their views freely. The Solicitor-General suggested that this would be an approach to local option; but it required a very keen Celtic imagination indeed to evolve local option out of the Amendment. The local authority would probably refer the matter to a committee, which would consider all the local circumstances, and then decide as to whether a licence should be opposed or supported, and on what conditions it should be granted. He thought that quarter sessions would be rather pleased to have the assistance of the local authority. He could not see what possible objection there could be to the proposal. The late Archbishop Temple favoured it; and it was the opinion of every moderate-minded man that the local authorities should have the power to appear and express an opinion through counsel as to the granting of new licences. The Home Secretary proposed that any money obtained from new licences should go to the local taxation account; but, surely, the authority which had the expenditure of that money ought to be able to suggest to the licensing bench the payment which ought to be made. He hoped the Prime Minister would see his way to accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 13, after the words last omitted, to insert the words, 'provided that no new licence shall be granted until at least three weeks notice shall have been first given to the local authority for the area in which the premises are situate, and the justices have considered all representations made by such local authority, either in writing or at the hearing of the application, in respect of such application.'"—Mr. Lloyd-George.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said the hon. Member desired that the local authority should have some means of saying how the money was to be made which they were to spend. That was exactly what temperance reformers on the other side of the House most vehemently objected to. Was not the Amendment, moreover, unnecessary fron the point of view of the hon. Member? He talked as if the local authority had now no right to appear before the magistrates. The law at present was, he understood, and would still remain, that "in the case of an application for a new licence any member of the public may appear before the licensing justices and oppose the grant of such licence," etc. A fortiori a person so much a member of the public as the representative of the local authority might do so.

Mr. ASQUITH: He cannot spend money on it.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No, and therefore he cannot employ counsel; but surely in a matter like this that would not be the best way of dealing with a purely administrative point.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: The applicant employs counsel invariably, and so does anyone who opposes. Surely the local authority ought to have counsel.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said he would have thought otherwise. The local authority must know what was going on and have full cognisance of the fact that a new licence was to be granted. They could make any proposals they liked to the magistrates. Whilst they would not gain anything by the Amendment, he thought a great deal would be lost. He did not think the general management of public affairs would be greatly improved by throwing this additional controversial subject upon their shoulders. The Amendment would do nothing which might not be done now, but it would be making a suggestion, which he would regret to see in an Act of Parliament, that part of the normal duties of a local authority should be to canvass the kind of advice they should give to the magistrates in the case of a new licence, not only as to the necessity of it, but as to the terms on which it should be granted. It would be better to leave the law as it was, allowing full liberty to all local authorities to say what they had to say to the magistrates responsible for granting new licences.

Mr. ASQUITH said he was much interested as to the little red volume from which the Prime Minister had quoted the law. The local authority had not now the power which the Amendment proposed to give them. If the local authority had, as the Prime Minister himself assumed, an interest as to the granting or withholding of a licence, surely they ought to be in a position to employ counsel and meet the other side upon equal terms. Unfortunately the House of Lords had been induced to correct the impression which formerly prevailed that local authorities were entitled to spend a modest sum out of the rates for the purpose of making their views known, and local authorities were now unable to voice the views of their constituents in that matter. He thought the Government might make a concession of that kind without in any way interfering with the general principles of their scheme.

Mr. HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle) said he wished to appeal to the Government to accept the Amendment in the interests of the children of the country. Recent legislation in connection with education had put new responsibilities on the local authorities. The old school boards could only protest against the granting of new licences; but they had no power to spend money or to employ counsel. In the interests of the child life of the country it was necessary that the Amendment should be accepted.

Mr. WHITTAKER pointed out that the municipal corporations had a position in this matter somewhat different from anything which would accrue if they were made the licensing authority. Municipal corporations, through their watch committees, had control of the police, than whom nobody knew more as to the necessity or desirability of the granting or the renewal of licences; but the local authority had no power to engage legal assistance in pursuing to the Court of Appeal the opinions of their watch committees. He submitted that the watch committee, inasmuch as they had control of the police, ought to have power through the local authority to employ at the public cost legal assistance in order that the opinion of the police might be adequately expressed before the licensing authority. The Amendment was a very modest one, and he hoped the Government would accept it.

Sir JOHN GORST (Cambridge University) supported the appeal of the hon. Member for the Barnard Castle Division. A constant ground of objection to proposed sites for elementary schools was the existence of a public-house in the neighbourhood which would interfere either with the school itself or with the children attending the school. That power of objection was all very well with regard to existing public-houses, but there was nothing to prevent a new public-house being placed in a position disadvantageous to an elementary school. He submitted that it was only right that a local authority, which was charged with the duty of superintending public education, should have a voice before the magistrates in order to warn them of the evils which, from the point of view of the school, might result from the grant or the renewal of a licence.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR thought the case just brought forward was not one which required to be supported by counsel or solicitors. He was quite willing to rate as highly as the right hon. Gentleman opposite the skill of the profession of which he was so great an ornament, but it was surely enough that the members of the local authority, or the chairman on their behalf, should tell the magistrates that if a new public-house was required it must not be put down close to an elementary school. Such a case appealed to everybody, and he could not see what would be gained by the local authority being empowered to pay for such presentation to be made to the licensing magistrates. He hardly thought that such a change in the existing law was at all required to carry out the object hon. Members had in view.

Mr. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.) said the Prime Minister had treated this Amendment merely as a proposal for enabling the local authorities to employ counsel, but such a view was based upon a complete misconception of the position occupied by the local authorities on these matters, and the practical steps which had been taken to give effect to their views. In the Tynemouth case, to which reference had been made, the justices had deprived six or seven houses of their licences, and the corporation decided to use public funds for the purpose of sustaining the action of the magistrates on appeal. That decision involved the employment of counsel, the collection of evidence, the engagement of a solicitor, and the payment of the costs of securing the attendance of witnesses; and while the crown of the structure might have been the counsel who ultimately adorned it, the earlier steps, which were infinitely more important, were all necessary in order to enable the local authority to make its opinion felt before the quarter sessions. The situation at present was that local authorities could not spend a single sixpence out of the rates for the purpose of conveying to the committee of quarter sessions their opinion upon matters of enormous importance to themselves. A phrase in the Amendment of the Home Secretary placed the matter on an entirely new basis, because the justices were to consider, amongst other things, "the interests of the public." How were they to know what were the interests of the public in connection with a matter with reference to which they had not necessarily any local knowledge whatever? They were being called upon to discharge an important function without having the means of ascertaining the facts. They would have a highly partisan aspect of the case presented by the applicant, but the other side would be left to the uninstructed zeal of private individuals who were opposed to the licence. It was true that members of the local authority might appear as individuals, but there was no voice of the authority as such, and no official representation was conveyed to the licensing committee to guide them in their decision. The Amendment involved no infringement of the principle of the Bill; it simply freed local authorities from the fetters placed upon their action by the decision of the House of Lords in the Tynemouth case—a decision which on public grounds could not be sustained—and he hoped the Government would grant the concession asked for.

Mr. PEMBERTON (Sunderland) joined in the appeal to the Government to accept the Amendment, which was certainly not against the principle of the Bill. It was not the case that the expression of public opinion of the district was always before the licensing authority when the question of the granting or the renewal of licences was considered. An individual might come before the licensing committee, but he came only as an individual, and naturally his views had not the same force as if he came as a representative of the local authority. One had only to think of the position before a Committee upstairs. When an individual appeared as the chairman of a public body he carried much more weight than the man who, although the chairman of a public body, appeared simply as an individual. The same argument really applied to the case they were now considering, and he therefore hoped that the Government would favourably consider the Amendment. As an attempt to meet those Members of the Party who did not see eye to eye with their leaders on the Bill the acceptance of the Amendment would be welcomed.

Mr. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said that on the question of expense he might remind the Committee that two years ago they enabled the licensing justices to defend their decisions on appeal at the cost of the rates. That made it no longer necessary for the local authority to duplicate that operation practically out of the same pockets. As to the contention that this Amendment was necessary in order to get the opinion of the police authority in boroughs, he knew a case where, whether legally or otherwise, the licensing justices, in their capacity as conservators of the peace, called upon the chief constable to supply all the necessary information as to the police aspects of the case. Really, as a matter of practice, with all respect to the hon. Member for Sunderland, could any man in his senses dream that it was necessary for a local authority to employ counsel in order to convey to the justices the simple fact that the resolution against the granting of a licence had been passed by the local authority? When they had conveyed that resolution what was there more?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said this looked like an attempt to quarter the lawyers on the rates. They had already got the school board rate, the poor rate, and the police rate, and under this Amendment there would be a lawyer's rate. In his opinion there was no need whatever for the employment of any lawyer in so simple a matter as this. He must protest against this attempt to set up a tyranny of lawyers in every matter in which the public interest was concerned. Quarter sessions would be able to deal with all the representations made before them in the public interest even if they were not placed before them by a lawyer. He hoped the Solicitor-General was not going to join with his associates in making this further demand upon the rates. He trusted that this Amendment would be dismissed with the contempt which it deserved.

SIR EDWARD GREY said he trusted, on the other hand, that the Amendment would be received with the respect it deserved. He hoped the hon. Member for King's Lynn would welcome his intervention, for whatever other faults or qualities he might have, he was not a lawyer. It was the Prime Minister who had stumbled upon the legal point. The right hon. Gentleman had taken up a red book written, he believed, by a lawyer, and had been misled by that book apparently. The Prime Minister used two arguments against the Amendment. The first was that local authorities could already do under the law what it had been clearly proved they could not do. That argument therefore fell to the ground. The other argument was that, even if they could, it was undesirable that they should busy themselves with this very contentious matter of licensing. He thought that local authorities could not be kept free from contentious matters of this kind. Very often, indeed, the more contentious the matter the more necessary it was that they should be introduced into it. It would have been more useful if, instead of the red book, the right hon. Gentleman had had in his hand the Liquor Licensing Ordinance applied to the Transvaal. There the right hon. Gentleman would find that upon this question of the sale of liquor by retail, control was given by a vote of the majority of the voters, or, in their absence, to a majority of the white male population over twenty-one years of age, residing within the village or ward. When they heard of the thin end of the wedge for local option being introduced by this Amendment surely that argument was a little late in the day, more especially after the Government had gone so far in regard to a community in the Transvaal, in a backward state as regarded representative institutions. He thought the Prime Minister ought to feel that he owed the Opposition a concession. The right hon. Gentleman charged them with inconsistency because he had been bombarded with representations not to interfere with the discretion of the justices. Now that he had fettered the discretion of the justices he thought the right hon. Gentleman might give them some compensation by bringing in the popular element to the extent of enabling representative bodies to advise the justices. The Bill said that the licensing authority should consider the public interest. Surely those words contained the logical conclusion that a representative authority should have the right to offer such advice or make such representations as they thought fit.

MR. BUTCHER (York) said that in this matter of new licences it had been said that the public interest could not be properly represented unless counsel or solicitors were employed by the local authority.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said his Amendment provided that notice should be given to the local authority before the hearing of applications for new licences, and it provided that magistrates must hear the representatives of the local authorities.

MR. BUTCHER said it had been pointed out that every member of the local authority was entitled to go before quarter sessions with all the authority he possessed as a member of that local authority, and this was not disputed.

Mr. LAWSON WALTON: As I understand the law, they cannot appear officially.

Mr. BUTCHER said they could appear as members of the public, and he should be very much surprised if their authority was diminished at all, because they were members of a public authority. On the contrary, it seems to him that their authority would be very much increased when it was known that they were members of the authority. Proceeding, the hon. Member said he knew no reason why the chairman of a local authority should not be authorised by resolution of his board to appear before quarter sessions and state their views authoritatively on his own behalf and on behalf of his council; and he should be astonished to hear that quarter sessions would refuse to hear him. It had been argued that this was not sufficient, and that it was necessary to appear by counsel or solicitor; but if laymen appearing before quarter sessions showed half the ability many laymen in that House had shown they would do extremely well. If there was a general feeling that the local authority ought to collect evidence, it would be necessary to allow them to go to a certain amount of expense. In the present state of the law the cost of putting quarter sessions in full possession of the facts of the case could not be got out of the public rates. If there was a general feeling in the House that in order to collect evidence it was necessary that the local authority should go to a certain amount of expense, and if it were a fact that at present that expense could not be paid for out of the rates, then he hoped that the Government would at a later stage of the Bill take this matter into consideration.

Mr. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.) said an appeal had been made to the Government by the hon. Member for York, who was regarded as the author of this Bill——

Mr. BUTCHER: I do not claim any such distinction.

Mr. YOXALL said he could not help thinking that if the Prime Minister were present he would, after hearing the views of the hon. Member for York, have yielded on this particular point. A great feature of the debates had been that, when the Solicitor-General had exercised his great knowledge and ability and was evidently in a mood to concede something, he had been unable to make that concession because of the furtive and temporary appearances of the Prime Minister. So now the Solicitor-General was to be overridden by the Prime Minister. The Amendment generally commended itself to the whole Committee. The Government had brought into existence all over the country local authorities for education. It was part of the duty of these authorities, when any private enterprise in the neighbourhood of their schools was likely to be injurious to those schools, to protest against it, but the chairman of the local authority could not go before the licensing justices in his official capacity, and make a representation against a licence being given to a house near a school, which, in the view of the authority, would be prejudicial. There was no doubt that the local authority should be given such power, and he hoped the Government would take that view.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said he did not think he was open to the particular charge the hon. Member had made against him, because before the Prime Minister spoke he had expressed the opinion that this Amendment, as drawn, would not enable the local authority to defray costs out of the rates. But the Amendment was intended to serve an entirely different purpose. It had been pointed out over and over again that any member of the public could go before the justices. The whole of the local authority could appear in a body, wearing their robes if they had any, and express their views before the justices. They could pass resolutions and forward them to the justices. They could hold meetings and publish the resolutions passed there, and the justices would know them just as well as if the members of the local authority appeared in their official capacity. This was not a question of the employment or the non-employment of counsel. What this Amendment sought was to give the local authority a statutory right to interfere at the investigation of licensing cases. The hon. Baronet had said that there was no question of interference. But there was a question of interference, and he would tell the Committee why. What would be the effect if the treatment of a particular case entered into politics at local elections? Could anybody maintain that such a proceeding would not conflict with the administration of the law by the local justices? Everybody must know that an immediate conflict would arise, and that it would become an acute question of politics in the neighbourhood. They would go further and say that the local justices were not representative of the people, not elected by the people, and that they were absolutely overriding what had been thoroughly investigated before the electors at the election. Whether it would be a good system to allow the local authorities to administer the clause instead of allowing the justices to do so, was a question that might be argued, but he hoped the Committee would not pass this Amendment with the idea that it only involved the collection of evidence. The Amendment would set up in the licensing districts the power of the local authority as against the power of the justices.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey) said the Solicitor-General was under a misapprehension as to the case made on the Opposition side. They were accustomed to sympathetic consideration of Amendments from the hon. and learned Gentleman, but on this occasion he had departed from that rule. He understood the Solicitor-General to say, Why not go there as individuals? If it was just as powerful for officials to go in their individual capacity, why that strong tirade at the end of his speech? He submitted that there ought to be authority of some kind given to local authorities to go before the justices. It had been a complaint for many years past that if there was opposition to a licence it was left to private individuals, and it very often happened that what was everyone's duty was no one's duty. In that way the temperance party had had to contend against a powerful trade. It was not reasonable that where a local authority took a view on a matter of this kind, they should not be allowed to state that view in an official way. This was not a question of employing counsel. The local authority must judge of the necessity of that in each particular case. He noticed that the Bill provided that the brewers might be represented by counsel at quarter sessions. It should be remembered that at present the licensing justices could be represented by counsel at quarter sessions; but as he understood, that would not happen under the Bill, because it was the licensing justices' report that was to be considered by quarter sessions. He must say that the opposition of the Government to this Amendment showed once more their preference of the interests of the brewers to the interests of the public, so far as this Bill was concerned. His hon. friend the Member for Carnarvon had referred to the old cricketer playing the game, while the gate-money went to the brewers. As the game was going on the brewers were the umpires, because it was for them to say whether the Government were to be in or out. It was because the umpires would not allow them to accept this Amendment that the Solicitor-General had hardened his heart.

MR. RITCHIE (Croydon) said he did not think that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken was justified in adopting such a tone. He wished to express his regret that the Government had not seen their way to accept, at any rate, the principle of the Amendment, which he considered to be eminently reasonable. There was no question of the local authority being brought in to deal with anything in the nature of a vested interest; but he could not conceive of anything more proper than that the local authority should have a voice in the question whether a new interest should be created. Indeed he did not understand the Government to deny that the local authority were, or ought to be, charged with certain responsibility in this matter, because the hon. and learned Gentleman said that any member of the local authority might appear before the justices. If it were true that the local authority had or ought to have an interest in these matters, it could not be wrong that they should have some means for putting forward the views that they held. He could not conceive why, when a new licence was proposed to be created, the local authority, which was responsible for good order and conduct in the locality, should not have the means of putting their views before the licensing authorities. He could not but think that the Government might reconsider the question. A Government lost nothing by being reasonable upon Amendments which were not in themselves vital, but which did commend themselves to a very considerable number of Members. He would suggest to his right hon. and learned friend that he might at least say that on this matter the Government were prepared to keep an open mind, even if they could not accept this particular Amendment. It was a very general feeling in the House that local authorities should have the power to put their views or objections before the licensing authorities.

Mr. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) said he thought it would be extremely desirable if the question of granting licences was taken out of the hands of the justices and put into the hands of some public authority. He thought that the brewers themselves would be rather in favour of this Amendment, because they complained that any teetotaler was able to oppose the renewal or the grant of a licence. Down to 1894 any person could enforce a right to a public footpath at his own expense, but no public authority had the right to expend public money for that purpose. The power, however, was given in the Act of 1894. The result was that if there was any question of defending footpaths, it was taken in hand by the district council or the county council. and private persons had practically abandoned their rights. He thought it would be very desirable that the same course should be followed in regard to licences. He thought that any Amendment which tended to take opposition to applications for licences out of private hands and put it on the public authority should be adopted.

*Mr. MARSHALL HALL (Lancashire, Southport) said he thought that this was an Amendment which the Government ought to allow. The local authority ought to have some right to appear at quarter sessions on the question whether these licences were to be granted or not, and it would be far better that they should be able to appear in their representative capacity. He thought, however, that there ought to be some provision to protect the views of the minority, in the event of the local authority being against a licence by a bare majority. What was wanted was some opportunity of showing what was the real feeling of the local authority on the matter.

Mr. LLOYD WHARTON said he would like to know what the local authority was which was referred to in the Amendment. Was it the parish council, or the district council, or the county council? He had heard of a parish council which consisted of two members. If it was a district council, its chairman, who was a county magistrate, would represent its views; and if it was the county council the clerk of the peace would represent it. He did not see what more was needed or why counsel should be employed.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that at an earlier period of the afternoon he explained the reason for putting down the Amendment to Sub-section 1, and in stating the reasons for putting down these new clauses he need only add a few words to what he said then. The provisions he now proposed in place of Sub-section 2 were really to explain the provisions of the Bill. The licensing justices were given power to grant new licences, subject to any reasonable conditions. It was further suggested the licences might be granted at the discretion of the licensing justices for any period not exceeding seven years. During that period the licences would not be subject to renewal, but at the end of seven years they would again be treated as new licences, and the conditions under which the justices originally granted them would apply. The reason for giving the justices this power was that these new licences would not come under the compensation clauses of the Bill, and therefore it was desirable that they should be granted in this form, in order that a substantial tenant might be obtained. There was no obligation on the part of the justices to grant a licence for the full seven years; they could grant a licence for any period not exceeding the term; or they need not make use of this method at all. As those licences when granted would not require renewal, or come under the supervision of the licensing justices every year, provision had been made for enforcing the conditions under which they were granted. A Court of summary jurisdiction would have the power of forfeiture if the licensee did not observe the conditions, and in that way the proper observance of the conditions under which the licence was granted was assured. Having excluded those new licences from the operation of the compensation fund, it had been necessary to find a fund into which any money derived from the higher payments in respect of the licences should be placed, and the Government, therefore, had arrived at the conclusion that that money should be transferred and used in a similar way to those funds, which under Section 20 of the Local Government Act, 1888, were transferred to the Local Taxation Fund and used in the relief of rates. The object was to secure to the justices in the granting of new licences power to insist upon reasonable conditions, and to ensure that they should take particular care that no new monopoly value was created. He begged to move.

'(2) The justices of a licensing district on the grant of a new licence may attach to the grant of the licence such conditions, both as to the payments to be made and the tenure of the licence, and as to any other matters, as they think proper in the interests of the public, and shall attach such conditions as they think best adapted for preventing any private person from obtaining any benefit from any monopoly value of the licence.

'(3) For the purposes of this section a new on-licence may be granted for a term not exceeding seven years, and where a licence is so granted for a term, any application for a re-grant of the licence on the expiration of the term shall be treated as an application for the grant of a new licence, not as an application for the renewal of a licence, and during the continuance of the term the licence shall not require renewal.

'(4) The amount of any payments made in pursuance of any conditions under this section shall be collected and dealt with in the same manner as the duties on local taxation licences within the meaning of Section 20 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

'(5) A licence granted for a term under this section may (without prejudice to any other provisions as to forfeiture) be forfeited, if any condition imposed under this section is not complied with, by order of a Court of summary jurisdiction made on complaint, or if the holder of the licence is convicted of any offence committed by him, as such, by the Court by whom he is convicted; but where a licence is so forfeited the owner of the licensed premises shall have all the rights conferred on owners by Section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1874.' "—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked whether this new proposal ought not to have originated in Committee of the Whole House. It was in fact a proposal to increase the licence duties, and on the Finance Bill the Chairman had ruled that such a proposal required origination in Committee of the Whole House. The only differences in the present proposal were that the burden was to be imposed by the magistrates, that it was optional, and that it applied only to new licences. Unless those slight differences were held to alter the principle, he submitted that the ruling to which he had referred applied to the proposal now before the Committee.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I am relieved from the necessity of making any original pronouncement on the matter, as the question has already been brought before the notice of Mr. Speaker, who, after full consideration, has ruled that no Committee was necessary.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: On this Amendment?

*THE CHAIRMAN: Yes. I may say that I had come to the same conclusion, because this charge is levied not Imperially but locally. It goes to local purposes, and it need not even be levied at all. But it is unnecessary for me to go into reasons, because Mr. Speaker has already ruled on the subject.

SIR ROBERT REID: Will it be competent for any private Member to move to increase the licence duties proposed by this clause?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The clause gives the fullest latitude. The justices are to be given power to fix "any such sum"; they may fix £1,000,000 for each licence if they choose.

SIR ROBERT REID: Are we at liberty to propose that the full amount be imposed, instead of leaving the amount at the option of the justices?

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not understand what the hon. and learned Member means by "the full amount." If the justices think fit to impose the condition that for every new licence £1,000,000 should be paid, they will be able to do so.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I take it, then, the Amendment of my hon. and learned friend to impose 4 per cent., and so on, will be perfectly in order?

*THE CHAIRMAN: Yes, but that would probably be limiting the discretion of the justices.

SIR ROBERT REID: Then it would be in order.

MR. CRIPPS (Lancashire, Stretford) said that in his opinion the present proposals of the Home Secretary met the real difficulties of the licensing question much less satisfactorily than the original proposals of the Bill, and there were two or three points on which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would enlighten the Committee before they went into the details of the question. Under the Bill the terms to be imposed on the granting of new licences were placed in the discretion of quarter sessions. They were now to be placed in the discretion of the authority for the particular licensing district in which the licence was applied for. That, he thought, was a great mistake. It ought not to be possible for different conditions to be imposed in each licensing district of a county; unless the same conditions applied throughout the county at large the administration of the law would be rendered exceedingly difficult. For instance, if the licensing authority in any particular district imposed conditions which quarter sessions thought to be not in the public interest, quarter sessions would have the power to refuse the new licence on that ground, but not to impose such conditions as they thought right and proper. Was that really a practicable method of dealing with the question? It was a serious question, because it might lead to a complete deadlock. If quarter sessions thought the conditions imposed were unsatisfactory, when the licence came up for confirmation they ought to deal with the whole subject-matter, and decide not merely whether they should refuse the licence on the ground that the conditions were unsatisfactory, but also whether they themselves should not impose conditions which they thought were in the public interest. Were the hands of quarter sessions to be tied by this power being withheld? The responsibility for confirmation rested, in the last resort, not with the licensing district but with quarter sessions, and they could not exercise that authority without full powers being given to them.

The second proposition was much more serious. He understood that in future new licences were practically to be put up to auction and sold to the highest bidder. He did not think that would be in the public interest and they ought not to deal with new licences in that way. There were much larger interests involved, and they ought to grant new licences under the best conditions and to the best applicants whether they were prepared to pay the highest price or not. Instead of having the power to deal with licences from year to year as regarded ill-conduct and disciplinary powers, which were so important and which had worked so admirably in regard to the licensing laws in the past, all those powers were now to be taken away. They proposed to put new licences up to auction and then give the purchaser a seven years term during which he was not to be interfered with however much the local magistrates might think it desirable to interfere. It had been suggested as regarded these licences that they ought to see that the persons who applied for them did not get a monopoly value. He quite agreed with that, but that was an entirely different matter from putting the licences up to auction, a proceeding which might be exercised to the detriment of true temperance reform. He hoped that no principle of that kind would be introduced into this Bill. This was not a matter of sale and purchase, but a matter of the public interest. There ought to be the same annual power to deal with them as at present and he was not prepared to tie the hands of the magistrates for seven years and take away their disciplinary powers. The proposal of the Home Secretary provided—

> "(2) The justices of a licensing district on the grant of a new licence may attach to the grant of the licence such conditions, both as to the payments to be made and the tenure of the licence, and as to any other matters, as they think proper in the interests of the public, and shall attach such conditions as they think best adapted for preventing any private person from obtaining any benefit from any monopoly value of the licence."

It was difficult to know exactly what that meant, but he thought its effect would be thac a person who in the ordinary way would be willing to invest money would not be willing, under those rules, to erect the class of public-house wanted. How could they expect any man to do that if he was not going to get a profit? It meant that they would drive out of the competition the best class of men, and would practically compel people to erect in the future houses of a less efficient type, or else reintroduce the very class of house they all wanted to get rid of. This difficulty was all owing to the absurd notion of seeking to introduce so great a matter as State regulation. By adopting this system they would defeat their own ends, and drive away the people they ought to encourage, for he could not imagine anyone building good public-houses under those conditions, because at the end of seven years the purchaser might be dispossessed and have to pay again. Could they conceive anyone investing money to build public-houses or rebuilding them so as to be satisfactory from the hotel or saloon point of view under such conditions? Every new licence in the future would come under these terms and the old law would be altered from top to bottom and altered in the wrong direction. Was it important to introduce the best article and to provide the best premises? Was it important to have the business carried on so as to have the best social conditions? He considered that the terms of this Amendment so far from conducing to a higher level of our licensing system in the future would tend entirely to have a contrary effect. The Amendment would tend to reduce the system to a level which they would all regret. If the present licence duty was not sufficient that was a matter for the House to consider, but to put a particular licence up to auction, and to put every obstacle in the way of a house being well-conducted, would, he thought, interfere to a most serious extent with the proper management of the house. That was not the proper way to conduce to temperance reform, and he sincerely hoped that some Amendment would be introduced which would not revolutionise our licensing system in the future as was proposed by the Amendment of the Home Secretary.

Sir ROBERT REID said he agreed with one observation of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, namely, that it was not possible to adequately discuss this new system in the limited time allowed. He thought the Amendment a very great improvement on the original proposals of the Government, and in default of a better he would support it. Annual licences had hitherto been granted, and all that law, justice, and the statutes could do had been done to express the undoubted rule that they were subject to be discontinued at the end of every year. That could not be made clearer than it already was. That system had broken down, or, at least, so far that the Government and a majority of this House had thought themselves bound to confer property and a freehold tenure on those who held licences. The moral originating from this consideration was that a person was not likely to invest money on an annual tenure on account of its being so short. It was contended that if the period were longer what was called the equity or expectation would not arise, at all events in so strong a form, especially as it was said in the Amendment that after seven years it was to be treated as an application for a new licence, and not an application for a renewal. The point, therefore, was that when the seven years tenure had come to an end the licence was not to last longer. He thought words should be put in to say that at the end of seven years the licence would not be continued unless public necessity required that it should be renewed. He did not know that that was not implied. He did not think the Amendment was open to the strictures of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

*MR. PEEL (Manchester, S.) said the points dealt with by the hon. and learned Gentleman on that side of the House were whether all these conditions were only to be applied by the licensing session, and whether quarter sessions, when the matter came before them for confirmation, should have some power of altering the conditions or whether the question ought to be: Shall we grant this licence or not? In regard to the first point he thought there was a very great deal to be said for it. Conditions might be inserted for bringing the general administration in the different licensing quarters in a county into some kind of similarity. On the next point he could not help feeling that the hon. and learned Gentleman had to some extent exaggerated the words that were placed in the clause when he said that the putting up of a licence to the highest bidder would be an extremely bad thing for the general public. Hon. Members on the Opposition side had been contending that too much power was placed in the hands of brewers and brewery companies. It seemed to him that the conditions now proposed were so severe that small men would not be got to put money into licensed houses. It would only be possible for the large brewer or brewery company to get the licence, and it would be acquired in some cases not for the purpose of getting money out of it but to prevent other parties from getting the licence. In that way the proposal might not work to the best advantage. He was not sure that his hon. and learned friend had attached sufficient importance to some of the other words in the Amendment.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this evening.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4:—

Amendment again proposed—

"In page 3, line 14, to leave out Sub-section (2), and insert the words—

'(2) The justices of a licensing district on the grant of a new licence may attach to the grant of the licence such conditions, both as to the payments to be made and the tenure of the licence, and as to any other matters, as they think proper in the interests of the public, and shall attach such conditions as they think best adapted for preventing any private person from obtaining any benefit from any monopoly value of the licence.

'(3) For the purposes of this section a new on-licence may be granted for a term not exceeding seven years, and where a licence is so granted for a term any application for a regrant of the licence on the expiration of the term shall be treated as an application for the grant of a new licence, not as an application for the renewal of a licence, and during the continuance of the term the licence shall not require renewal.

'(4) The amount of any payments made in pursuance of any conditions under this section shall be collected and dealt with in the same manner as the duties on local taxation licences within the meaning of Section 20 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

'(5) A licence granted for a term under this section may (without prejudice to any other provisions as to forfeiture) be forfeited, if any condition imposed under this section is not complied with, by order of a Court of summary jurisdiction made on complaint, or if the holder of the licence is convicted of any offence committed by him as such, by the Court by whom he is convicted, but where a licence is so forfeited the owner of the licensed premises shall have all the rights conferred on owners by Section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1874.' "—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

*MR. PEEL, continuing his speech, said whatever view the Committee might hold on this particular Amendment everybody must agree that it was of very great importance. It established an entirely new principle of licensing, and he could not but regret that the discussion upon it had not commenced earlier in the afternoon, and that so much time had been absorbed in the discussion of other Amendments, which however useful they might be, were not comparable with this in importance. The diminution of the powers of the magistrates under this Bill had been referred to; it had been, in fact, made the football of the debate throughout these discussions. There, however, could be no doubt that in one respect the powers of the magistrates were diminished if licences were granted for a longer period than one year; but that power was purely optional. The magistrates could grant these licences for any time they liked up to a period of seven years. Looked at from another point of view the powers of the magistrates were greatly enhanced in the direction of imposing conditions and money payments. Those who complained of the diminution of the power of the licensing magistrates had not taken into consideration the position the holders of these licences would be in if a clause of this kind were not passed. By the general assent of the House these new licences were to be exempted from the contribution and compensation clause, and therefore the licence-holders would be in exactly the same position as they were previous to this Bill being introduced. They would have the liability of having the licence taken away every year, but on the other hand the knowledge that they would get a renewal of the licence every year subject to good conduct. Therefore, in discussing the diminution of power, they had to compare it not with the freedom enjoyed under this Bill, but with the freedom possessed in the years preceding the introduction of it. With regard to the monopoly value, he thought it would be a most difficult thing to make any calculation as to what the monopoly value was. It must always be a pure speculation, as it would be impossible to say what would be the profit of a particular house in seven years. But the magistrates might impose as a condition a money payment—not at the commencement of the granting of the licences, but the payment of a certain percentage on the profits on the principle of the gold tax in the Transvaal every year; and inasmuch as the monopoly value must be a purely hypothetical value that would, in his opinion, be the wisest course to adopt. The only weakness in the proposal was, that, having to pay a considerable sum as monopoly value, the owner would make much less money out of the licence, and at the end of the seven years the magistrates, in consideration of that fact, might be apt to say, "We will continue this man's licence for another seven years," and so something approaching a vested interest would again grow up.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON said it appeared to him a most remarkable thing that a great financial Resolution such as this could be accomplished in the simple way in which this had been brought about. He did not challenge the Amendment. It meant the introduction of high licence duties into this country. For nineteen years he had stood almost alone in advocating high licence duties, and now the Government of the day had been converted to them. Nothing would induce him to vote against the Amendment, which was the one great financial provision in the Bill. But this scheme involved three distinct categories of licence duties—first of all, the duties imposed by the Act of 1880; then the additional payments imposed for the purpose of compensation; and finally the duties created under this Amendment. He did not see any representatives of the Treasury on the Benches opposite although this was a Treasury Bill. He believed that the time would come when all these payments would be merged in one, and that the financial system of the licence duties would demand simplification. The present scheme involved a financial confusion which no self-respecting Chancellor of the Exchequer would tolerate for a moment. What would the result be? There would be two kinds of licences. A licence under the the old Act of 1880, by which the licensee was compelled to give up a fractional part of its monopoly value. Side by side with that a totally new set of licences were brought into existence, which were to be taxed up to the hilt as regarded monopoly value. How could such a discrimination between the old and new licences be justified? It seemed to him incredible that anyone could expect such a system to last. The brewers had a vested interest in the Tory Party being retained in office, although it appeared to him to be a vanishing security. He welcomed the proposal now before the Committee, because it was the beginning of the end, and because it introduced the principle of high licence.

Mr. DUKE (Plymouth) said his views in regard to licensing were not so revolutionary as those of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, but he agreed with him in welcoming the principle of the scheme, because it was a new departure. Anyone who regarded the public well-being would agree that they were too much fetterred by what their forefathers had done, and by conventions in regard to the liquor traffic. They on that side of the House disagreed with hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the mode by which the difficulties of the licensing question could be got rid of. They, on that side, believed that the rights of property which had grown up by reason of the action of their predecessors should not be disregarded. They were entitled with regard to new licences, however, to make new conditions, because conditions that were the subject of free bargain between the licence-holder and the community could not possibly inflict any hardship on the individual. When a bargain was made for a fixed term, there was no claim either moral or equitable at the expiry of the term for a renewal of the bargain. The monopoly of the sale of liquor, if resting on proper grounds, must be a monopoly for the public benefit. The Amendment was in some parts ambiguous, and he suggested the adoption of phraseology which would make it perfectly clear that the public were parting for a term of years with a monopoly right, which was for the future, in respect of new licences, to be a public right. It was suggested that if the justices in licensing districts in the counties were to set up separate conditions, there might be difficulty in dealing with the matter. Perhaps, however, if there was a common understanding in the House as to the desirability of a scheme of this kind, the Home Secretary might propose words which would ensure something like uniformity in the county area. He gave his hearty support to the principle of the Amendment.

Mr. DISRAELI (Cheshire, Altrincham) said he considered this clause was hardly adequate to deal with the object which it was intended to effect. The clause would affect the whole future licensing system of the country. He must say that the Government need not at the last moment have made so large a change in the procedure prescribed by the Bill in Clause 4. He did not want to find fault with the Bill; he thought it was a very good Bill; but it was now proposed, without any previous notice, to do away with the power of the magistrates in quarter sessions to make a county scheme for new licences. That power was to be given to petty sessions. There might be eight or nine petty sessional divisions in a county, and if each had their own regulations that must lead to confusion. He ventured to think that in altering the scheme from quarter to petty sessions it would put it out of the power of the magistrates to make a cohesive county scheme for dealing with new licences. He looked with alarm on the procedure by which new licences were to be granted on a seven years lease. Of course he might be told that great freedom would be given to the magistrates; but they might only give a lease for one or two years. The plan, he thought, would discourage the building of good houses, and would tend to increase the number of those mean public-houses in back streets, where so much drunkenness took place. It would also be unfortunate if licence-holders were relieved from the obligation of appearing annually before the magistrates and hearing what they had to say on matters affecting the trade. The effect of putting up licences to auction would be that nobody but large brewers would be able to obtain them. He very much regretted that he could not support the Amendment.

MR. AINSWORTH (Argyllshire) said it must be evident to hon. Members on both sides that this Bill marked a revolution in the licensing system of the country. They had been discussing how licences were to be managed, but he wondered whether hon. Members had asked themselves the question why a licence was ever granted? It was not for the benefit of the revenue, for that was comparatively insignificant; it was not granted for the benefit of the licence-holder or the large firm behind him. No; the licence was granted in the interest of the public and that was the reason why up to now no licence had ever been sold for money. Under the old system the wants of the neighbourhood were watched; but now that was to be done away with and the business was to be left to an authority sitting perhaps miles away. Having destroyed the system of local control the Government had now come to the point of saying, well, if the new licensing authority is to issue licences let it be to the highest bidder. In an hour and ten minutes this revolution would become law—they would have revolutionised the licensing system of the country. They were dealing in a hurry with the legal interests of the country; whether the holders of new licences had to pay any price at all had to be decided, but it should be decided with a view to the total revenue of the country and without regard to any accidental requirements of the local authorities.

*SIR PHILIP MUNTZ (Warwickshire, Tamworth) said that the Amendment would make a revolution in our licensing system. In his opinion instead of improving the class of houses and the class of tenants the new clause was calculated to deteriorate both. He failed to understand why the Opposition, who were opposed to tied houses, supported the proposal, because, speaking from a practical knowledge of the question extending over forty years, he could say that the whole of the new licences would pass into the hands of the brewers. He objected to licences being granted for a period of seven years without the annual approval of magistrates. The new system was unsound because under it they would not get the best class of tenant, but the man with the most money or the great brewer. At the end of the seven years the licence was to be again put up for auction, and if it was worth anything the great brewer would again step in. That would perpetuate the system of tied houses. He could not help feeling that the proposal was wrong. It required complete reconsideration and revision in order that another system might be introduced securing the best class of houses, and that no licence should be granted until there had been the most careful consideration by the magistrates at quarter sessions or petty sessions of the question whether the licence was required for the district. When it was determined that the licence should be granted it should only be granted to a house of the highest and best type, affording every accommodation, and to a man who would occupy it and who was in every way qualified by the highest character for the position. What guarantee was there that under this proposal they would secure a respectable licensee, if he knew that his occupation would only last for seven years. This was the worst system they could devise. The clause as it stood was unwise, unsound, and was based neither on the interests of the licensed trade or of those of temperance reform. He appealed to the Prime Minister to withdraw the clause and submit another in its place securing the objects he had suggested.

*MR. LAWSON WALTON said the hon. Member who had just spoken based his criticism of this Amendment on his distrust of the licensing authority. Every one of his arguments assumed that the magisterial bench of which he had had forty years experience would not deal wisely and in a judicial spirit with the jurisdiction vested in them under this Bill. The Amendment, which he thought was an admirable Amendment, proposed to give to the justices of the licensing district power which they did not now possess.

*SIR PHILIP MUNTZ: I said that in my opinion the magistrates had dealt wisely in the past with licensing questions and would do so in the future.

*MR. LAWSON WALTON said if that were the opinion of the hon. Member he was entirely at a loss to understand the feeling of apprehension with which he regarded an extension of the magistrates' powers. As he understood the hon. Member the power to impose conditions given under this Amendment would not be wisely exercised, and that so far from seeking the most eligible applicant the magistrates would be guided solely by financial considerations and would chose the highest bidder whether he were the best qualified or not. He asked the Committee to conclude that the justices would act wisely in the future. No argument whatever had been used against this jurisdiction being given to them. The magistrates would have ample power to clothe the granting of licences with any conditions they might choose to demand in the interests of the public, which by this Amendment they were expressly enjoined to consider. The attachment of some financial terms to the granting of a most valuable monopoly right was by no means inconsistent with the general policy of our licensing law. It was not an impossibility to choose the most eligible applicant and at the same time to recognise that they were conferring upon him a financial endowment in regard to which he might be fairly asked to make some contribution which would, to some extent, relieve the local burdens of the district. The hon. and learned Member for the Stretford Division was rather opposed to the provision under which it would be possible to have different conditions obtaining in different districts. But if they were to have experiments they must leave the magisterial discretion unfettered. If there magisterial Court was to be trusted, their was no reason why its discretion should be restricted.

There was another part of the Amendment which appeared to him more important, and that was the introduction of a system which he could not help thinking would ultimately be the licensing system in this country, viz., the power—which he wished was compulsory—to licensing justices to grant a seven years licence in place of the annual grant. No one who had considered this question could have avoided coming to the conclusion that the annual licence was an obsolete and inapplicable system. At present, when an application for a new licence was made, the justices asked to inspect the plans; plans involving expenditure possibly of thousands of pounds were submitted; they were inspected and passed, the house was constructed under the supervision of the Bench, and the licence was granted when the house was completed. But although it was obvious that many years must elapse before the capital expenditure was exhausted, the term of the licence was one year only. That was an obsolete system, totally inapplicable to modern conditions. If they were dealing solely with new licences, he did not think there could be the smallest question that the one year was doomed, and that they must give either an equity of renewal or a tenure of licence which would enable the person who obtained the licence to look forward to a definite period during which he would have some security for the capital he had invested. The problem in regard to new licences was so simple that the Government had been persuaded by the force of argument, and had provided under this Amendment that new licences should be for seven years, and that when that seven years had elapsed the licence would be enewed for another seven years. That system entirely removed the necessity for any compensation. The proposal under this section gave no compensation after the lapse of seven years, and when those seven years had elapsed there might be a review by the Bench of the whole situation of the district and its needs with regard to the trade.

If this argument was so sound that it had convinced the Government with regard to new licensing, was there no means by which the system might be applied to existing licences. If it was so sound that every new licence was to be granted on the footing of a lease of seven years, during which the tenant might count his risk of non-renewal at the end of that period, insure against loss, and limit the expenditure of his capital to the duration of his term—why should they not adapt that system, at once businesslike and logical, to the existing licences. Such a proposal he had himself made the subject of a new clause, which, however, would meet the fate of many other suggestions under the closure. How might that system be applied to licences now in existence? If the licensee were allowed to have the option of taking the renewal for seven years instead of one, of abstaining entirely from any contribution to the fund, and of keeping out of the scope of the scheme of compensation, he might be given the power of putting himself into the same category as the new licensees. He would become his own insurer. He might insure on better terms than this Bill provided and he would have all the advantages which a new licensee possessed under this clause. What was the objection to that system? He would gladly support the Amendment, which, if it could be carried one step further so as to bridge the chasm between new licences and old licences and obviate the absurd anomaly of having two classes of licences, would make then the Bill a statesmanlike measure.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that, though the form of this clause was new, it was the fact that from the first moment the Bill was introduced he had always explained to the House that, in the view of his colleagues, and in his own view, it was an essential part of their scheme that as regarded new licences, where existing rights were in no sense involved, a new system should be adopted. The hon. Member appealed to their sympathies because he could not bring on his own Amendment, but although they could not have the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment they were delighted to have had his speech. They only regretted that it was not made on the First or Second Reading.

MR. WHITTAKER said this provision was not before the House then.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the Bill was before the House, and what he was dropping a sympathetic tear over was that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not deliver his speech on the First or Second Reading or on some subsequent occasion when the fundamental principles of the Bill were under discussion. For he had said that the system of annual licences was antiquated and obsolete, that it was not appropriate to the present condition of affairs, and that there ought to be either an equity of renewal or a lease. Where was "Sharpe v. Wakefield"?

MR. LAWSON WALTON said he was indicating a perfect system. "Sharpe v. Wakefield" defined the existing law which was most imperfect.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman on the Second Reading would have been most highly valued. The hon. Gentleman behind him, not content with "Sharpe v. Wakefield," went back to the 16th century to show that annual licences were the proper system, and the idea that there was a right to an equity of renewal or a lease would have been received earlier in the debate by the hon. and learned Gentleman's friend with shouts of disapproval. If the hon. and learned Gentleman voted against the First and Second Reading, holding the ideas he did on the equity of renewal or right to a lease, it was impossible to square his votes with the view which, with so much eloquence and acumen, he had now expounded to the Committee.

MR. LAWSON WALTON pointed out that his argument referred to new licences. Where a house was constructed under the sanction of the Bench in the anticipation of an annual grant, there should be either an equity of renewal or a fixed term during which the tenant might provide against his capital being unexhausted. He was not dealing with old licences under the present system under which there had been so many warnings of the precarious character of their tenure, of which warnings "Sharpe v. Wakefield" was the most pointed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not follow the hon. and learned Gentleman. Many structural alterations had been required from men holding their licences on an annual tenure. The Government said it was an outrage to take the licence away without compensation. The hon. and learned Gentleman apparently thought it an outrage, but he had been voting steadily against the Bill, the object of which was to prevent that outrage. The speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman was a good speech from his own point of view, but he did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman's interruption explained the inconsistency between his arguments and his votes.

*MR. LAWSON WALTON: I do not think it is a good Bill; I think it is a very bad Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he knew all that. He thought the criticisms of the clause from the Government Benches had been uttered under a complete misconception both of the purpose and effects of the clause. The purpose of the clause was to prevent in the future in regard to new licences that slow but inevitable growth of equitable rights, not recognised by law, which had grown up in regard to old licences under the existing system, and which had proved such a difficulty in the way of reducing licences. He did not believe there was an hon. Member in the House who differed from that particular statement of the policy which they ought to pursue. To effect that object, upon which they were all agreed, his hon. friends said they would prefer annual licences rather than leases for seven years. But there was nothing in the clause to prevent the issue of annual licences. The matter was left to the magistrates to determine. His hon. friend had added to the error of supposing that this Bill required the magistrates to grant leases, the further error that this clause required them to put the licence up to auction. The hon. Member not only misinterpreted the clause but he did so in a way which absolutely reversed its true character and the intention of those who framed it. He asked hon. Members to turn their attention for a moment to the phrase in the first paragraph of the second sub-section—

> "The justices of a licensing district on the grant of a new licence may attach to the grant of the licence such conditions, both as to the payments to be made and the tenure of the licence, and as to any other matters, as they think proper in the interests of the public."

His hon. friends also interpreted that sub-section of the clause to mean that the licensing justices were bound to see that the extremest sum was obtained for the monopoly value of a new licence that it was possible to obtain in the open market. How could the monopoly value of the licence be separated from the rest of the property?

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): By putting it up for auction.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is nothing about auction.

MR. LOUGH: It is the only plan.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the monopoly value was only part of the interest of the licence. How could they put up for auction that which might be of enormous value apart from the licence and from the monopoly value of the licence? What the clause contemplated was that the magistrates should draw a distinction between the value that would attach to the licence were there free trade in the sale of liquor and the value which attached to it because there was not free trade in the sale of liquor. That could not be put up to auction separately, and it must be done by a rough and ready method.

MR. AINSWORTH said that if a licence was to be sold for the benefit of the public the object must be to get the utmost possible value for it. If they did not do that they would not be selling the licence in the public interest, but in the interest of the man who bought it, because he would be getting it for less than its real value.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he was not quite sure that he fully understood the purport of his hon. friend's interruption. His hon. friends were also puzzled by the words in the clause "private persons." Those words were meant to prevent the clause from being applied to cases in which the beneficiary from the monopoly was the corporation of a town or some other public body of the kind. He believed that some hon. Members thought this phrase had been inserted in order to protect or to aid one particular form in which it was intended to deal with licensed premises—namely, the Public-house Trust Corporation. It had nothing to do with it either directly or indirectly. It had no special reference whatever to any form of private trading in liquor; but it was conceivable that in some districts there might be a desire that any product of monopoly value should go to the public. It was intended to make this possible, and it ought to be possible. It would be very wrong so to arrange any licensing laws that the monopoly value should not go to the public. If they restricted the liquor trade they were almost certain to create a monopoly value, do what they would. No one desired to have free trade in drink; it had been tried and it had failed, and no one wanted to try the experiment again. If they were going to restrict the trade, the mere fact that it was restricted had a strong tendency to give it a monopoly value. All that the Government desired was to give the monopoly value to the public and not to the private individual. It was therefore recognised that the clause was a serious endeavour to carry out an object agreed to by both sides of the House.

*Mr. WHITTAKER said that there should be a term to licences with full power to deal with them at the end of the term. The right hon. Gentleman had prevented the possibility of this power from being enjoyed in the future. It was a principle of great importance that there should be full power on the part of the justices to deal with licences at some time or other. The present proposal was an enormous improvement on the original proposal in the Bill, but the Prime Minister had not met the criticisms urged against it. There was, first of all, the loss of annual control. The licences would not come before brewster sessions until the end of seven years. That was an undesirable change. They should come up annually for review, as to conduct, because it was important not to lose the annual control. It was also undesirable that the licensing authority should, so to say, sell the licence. They ought to sell the licence for an annual sum, and it ought to be a very substantial sum, but he did not like the system of paying down a lump sum for a licence to cover a period of years because under such circumstances it would be very difficult to take that licence away. Therefore it would be much better if the payment was an annual one. If this principle was so sound and good why should it not apply to all licences, to off-licences as well as on-licences? The expressions "private person" and "monopoly value" were by no means clear. What was meant by monopoly value? The Prime Minister had suggested to them what it was not, but he had not told them what the monopoly value was.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said that monopoly value was the difference in value between the sale of liquor in existing circumstances under the existing law and what the value would be if there was free trade in liquor.

*Mr. WHITTAKER said that amounted to the difference in the value of the premises with a licence and without. In the ordinary case if there were free trade in liquor there would be no special value attaching to the premises, and they would be like any other premises. On that definition the real meaning of the monopoly value would be the additional value which the granting of this monopoly added to the premises. That, however, did not coincide with the definition given by the Solicitor-General, who seemed to think that it depended upon the profits. The ordinary profits resulting from the trade in drink would be distinct from the monopoly value which the licence would give to the premises. Every successful trade was conducted at a profit and it did not mean that all the profit of carrying on the trade would be taken. It seemed to him that there was substance in the contention that practically these licences would still go to the great brewers.. He did not think they would get rid of monopoly by selling at the highest possible price, but he thought they must sell at the highest possible price if they were to get the monopoly value. If they were to sell to the highest bidder in order to get the full monopoly value the licences would go to the great brewers as before. It seemed to him that was inconsistent with the provision in the clause that they were going to protect the public interest. The buyer would have to sell the largest possible amount of drink in order to get a return for the price paid, and that would not be in the public interest. The hon. Member for the Tamworth Division had said that the justices could select the men. He thought the justices had very few opportunities of selecting the men now. The brewers selected the men and the justices had largely to take those who were offered to them. There was one point in the new clause he should like to make a remark upon. He did not like the idea of the extra levy upon licences going to the relief of local rates. At present licence duties went to the local authorities, and, therefore, to the relief of rates. The amount at present was comparatively small, but if they were to get into the way of levying on licences their full value that amount would become very substantial indeed, and it was undesirable that local authorities should depend for a large relief of the rates on the number of licences granted. He thought this extra charge should go to the National Exchequer rather than to the relief of local rates. The hon. Member for Manchester had suggested that under this proposal surrenders and exchanges might still continue, that was to say, it might be possible to surrender two or three licences in one place in order to get a new licence in another. As he read the proposal that would not be possible. If a new licence was to be obtained by the surrender of two or three others it must be perfectly obvious that they were not getting the full monopoly value. Therefore, it seemed to him that such an arrangement was not included under the proposal. He agreed with his hon. friend the Member for Dundee that this was introducing a very important change, and that they could not in any degree look upon the idea as a permanent one that one class of licences should pay full value to the State, while others would be allowed to pay only the nominal sum they paid now. He believed that in the near future they might look for very much increased licence duties.

There were unquestionably many respects in which this new proposal was an improvement on the old one. In the old proposal it was provided that the fees got for new licences should go to the compensation fund. That was not to be the case now. They were to go to the service of the public. He thought the clause abolished the possibility of exchanges and surrenders for new licences, and further, the new proposal would retain the power of granting new licences in non-county boroughs to the justices there. These were, he thought, important improvements. The plan was not the best one, and he felt certain that it would be a somewhat temporary one. He was afraid that not one of the existing licence-holders would adopt the suggestion of his hon. and learned friend of exchanging their licences for new ones on seven years terms, because under the Bill as it at present stood they would be entitled to very full compensation, while under the new arrangement they would be required to pay a very much increased fee. This was the beginning of a very great change indeed, and he thought that in the near future it would be extended to all licences. It certainly meant the end of the old condition of things. He regretted that under the operation of the closure this question could not receive anything like adequate discussion.

SIR J. STIRLING-MAXWELL (Glasgow, College), speaking as a friend to the Bill, ventured to repeat a Question of the hon. and learned Member opposite, which, he said, his right hon. friend had not answered. The Bill was designed to give compensation to existing licence-holders for an equitable right which Members on the Government side held that they possessed. That was laid down in the first part of the Bill; but they were now creating a new kind of licence in the future which would be unlike the old kind and would be much less valuable. How did the Prime Minister account for the discrepancy between the two? The difference did not represent the compensation, because that was already arranged for. It seemed to him that it only represented a flaw in the system which they were creating in this Bill. He would suggest that it might be possible at some date, without interfering with the system of compensation, to bring existing licences under the same improved conditions as were to be applied to the new ones.

MR. BOND (Nottingham, E.) said it was extremely important that the Committee should know what they were voting about, and he confessed he had some difficulty in interpreting some of the words in the Amendment. His difficulty was chiefly about "private person" and "monopoly value." He thought the Prime Minister misapprehended what was meant by "private person." These words had created a good deal of alarm, because it was thought the use of the words in this connection meant that individual arrangements would be excluded, whilst a similar disability was not inflicted on brewery companies or persons associated and brought together for the purpose of carrying on trade. He thought the matter ought to be made plainer. In regard to "monopoly value" it seemed to him a monopoly must mean an exclusive right to sell. He could understand the words "monopoly value" would apply to a licence granted to a publican to sell liquor in a village where he had no competitor within a radius of two or three miles, but in a town where there would be four, five, or six competitors he thought the term "monopoly value" could hardly be applied. He submitted that persons would not go into a business of a speculative character upon conditions of the nature indicated in the Amendment, and that the new clause would really have the effect of making it almost impossible to get new licences taken up. He could not but think that the passage of this clause in the form in which it now stood would go a long way towards bringing about a result he was sure the right hon. Gentleman did not desire, namely, that there would be hardly any new licences granted, even when they were required in the public interest.

MR. CRIPPS said they all recognised that as regarded new licences no right of compensation should arise as in the case of old licences. He understood that licences would be put up to auction, and granted for a term of seven years, but the right of annual revision should be retained to the magistrates in order that they might see that a public-house was being properly carried on. Their object was to have the Bill in the best possible form in justice to existing interests, and he hoped the points which had been raised would be fully considered by the Prime Minister and the Solicitor-General before the Report stage.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

And, it being Eleven of the clock, the Chairman proceeded, in pursuance of the Order of the House of the 5th July, to put the Question on the Amendment already proposed from the Chair.

Question, "That these words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

The Chairman then proceeded to put forthwith the Question necessary to dispose of the allotted Business to be concluded on the 3rd allotted Day.

Question, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 5:—

MR. WHITLEY said that on behalf of his hon. friend the Member for Flint Boroughs he wished to move the omission of the words "may if they think fit," and insert "shall." The object of the Amendment was to make it mandatory upon quarter sessions to reduce the area of the district in which the compensation would operate, and in which the committees would act in the matter of reduction of the licences. [Loud interruptions.]

*THE CHAIRMAN said it would be impossible to go on with the business if this disturbance continued.

MR. WHITLEY said he understood that it was not the intention to go on further with the Bill that night after the guillotine had fallen. The purpose of his Amendment, as he had said, was to reduce the areas of the districts in which the compensation fund would operate, and in which the committees would act in the matter of the reductions of licences. It had been found in connection with the Education Act that where the areas were large, administration was unsatisfactory. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 23, to leave out the words 'may, if they think fit,' and insert the word 'shall.'"—(Mr. Whitley.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. LOUGH said that on a point of order he wished to draw attention to a paragraph in the Closure Resolution, which said that the Chairman should proceed—

"Successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments moved by the Government of which notice has been given (but no other Amendments), and on every Question necessary to dispose of the allotted business to be concluded on the allotted day."

Now the Committee had disposed of the allotted business for this allotted day, and he would like to know whether it was in order to go on with the discussion of the Bill

*THE CHAIRMAN said that although the allotted business for the allotted day had been completed, the Committee could go on with other business, as there were still fifty minutes until midnight.

MR. LOUGH said that he thought the words in the Closure Resolution forbade the Committee making any further progress that evening.

*THE CHAIRMAN: It is competent for the Committee to proceed with the Fifth Clause. If the hon. Member does not desire further discussion, it is open to him to ask the Government to move that Progress be reported.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that, as far as the Government were concerned, they were quite prepared to proceed with the clause. He thought that was also the opinion of the Committee generally, in order that as many Amendments as possible might be saved from the application of the guillotine.

MR. LOUGH said that, having passed a Motion, the Committee ought to be bound by it.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not move to report Progress. As regarded the Amendment, there were many districts which, if divided, would render the compensation area insufficient. He therefore hoped the Committee would not accept the Amendment.

Mr. J. H. LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said he was not convinced by the argument of the Home Secretary. He thought it desirable that the quarter sessions should be told distinctly that it would be necessary for them to subdivide their districts in the interests of the efficiency of the Act. There was an undue centralisation of authority in the Bill.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. J. H. Whitley and Mr. Herbert Lewis.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) said it had already been decided that quarter sessions should have power to divide their administrative areas into districts for the purposes of the Bill, and the object of the Amendment he was about to move was to secure that if such divisions were made the districts should be those at present existing. The advantage of such an arrangement was that in each division there would then be local magistrates who for a long time had been in the habit of considering the requirements of the particular district, and who therefore had practical experience of the wants of the neighbourhood in the matter of public drinking facilities. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 24, after the word 'Act,' to insert the words 'which districts shall consist of the licensing districts or licensing divisions into which such area is now divided.'"—(Mr. Herbert Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That these words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON suggested that, inasmuch as the Committee had decided to leave it in the option of the quarter sessions to divide the county into districts, it would be far better to leave it to them to decide what those districts should be. The reason quarter sessions were being taken as the administrative power was that the existing districts were too small, and by reason of their smallness would frustrate the object of the insurance scheme of the Bill.

MR. WHITLEY thought there was much force in the last observation of the learned Solicitor-General. Personally, he was not in favour of too large districts, but, on the other hand, he did not want them too small. He suggested that the Solicitor-General should give some indication to the Committee that the Government would attempt to provide that the districts should be of a reasonable size.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract) said the remarks of the Solicitor-General on the last Amendment put in a nutshell the case for the proposal he was about to make. The ostensible object of the Bill was to reduce the number of licences, but it was obvious that if the counties were divided into too small districts the amount of the fund raised would be so small as to render impossible any reduction within a reasonable period. His Amendment provided that in no case should the districts be of less than £10,000 annual value. He was not tied to that particular figure; he simply desired to give some direction to the quarter sessions to prevent the districts being too small. In many districts the full amount of the tax would not be levied, and in such cases the amount of the fund raised would be very small. He hoped the Government might see their way to give the Amendment favourable consideration.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 26, at the end, to insert the words, 'Provided that the annual value of premises to be taken as for the purpose of the publican's licence duty within any such district shall in the aggregate be not less than ten thousand pounds.'"—(Mr. Nussey.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he could not accept the Amendment. The Bill provided that quarter sessions should decide for themselves what the area was to be and he thought it would be far better to leave all these questions to the discretion of that body.

Question put.

Mr. LEVY (Leicestershire, Loughborough) moved to omit Sub-section 2 of Clause 5, which empowers quarter sessions to delegate their powers to a committee. He objected that the great powers to be vested in the Home Secretary might override quarter sessions. The Bill provided that the Home Secretary might appoint the committee. That committee might have to deal with questions of compensation and the renewal or refusal of licences. It was imperative upon quarter sessions to delegate certain powers to the committee, and he wished to know whether quarter sessions would have power to revise the decisions of the committee. He thought the House should have some information as to the object of handing over great powers to a committee, of the constitution of which they were told nothing. The Government had indicated their opinion that counties should be divided into somewhat smaller areas, and that being so it seemed unnecessary to have any committee set up.

"In page 3, line 27, to leave out Sub-section (2)."—(Mr. Levy.)

Sir EDWARD CARSON said he would remind the hon. Member that there were county licensing committees, and it was necessary that power should be delegated to the committees which would be set up under this Bill. Already under Clause 4 certain powers had been transferred to the committees. He thought the hon. Member would quite see that it would be impossible for the quarter sessions properly to supervise all the questions with which the committees would have to deal relating to renewal.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

Irish Degree of Bachelor of Arts.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the total number of candidates from the Queen's Colleges of Belfast, Cork, and Galway, and Magee College, Derry, who have taken the degree of B.A. at the Royal University during the past five years; and the total number from Kelvin House, Belfast, who have done so during the same period.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Royal University is precluded from taking cognisance, by way of qualification, of the places of education of candidates for the B.A. Degree Examination. Candidates for the degree when entering for the examination are requested, however to state on their entry forms the names of any institutions at which they may have been prepared for the examinations, and from these statements the following returns have been made:—

B.A. Degree.

Candidates have passed the examination for this degree from the undermentioned institutions as follows:—

	In 1899.	In 1900.	In 1901.	In 1902.	In 1903.

Increase of Pauperism in the Large Parishes of Scotland.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the Local Government Board are aware that, during the last ten years, there has been a steady increase in the number of outdoor and indoor poor in some of the large burghal parishes of Scotland and a consequent increase in the cost of their maintenance; and whether, looking to the state of trade during these years, the Board will consider the subject and devise some means of arriving at the causes which have contributed towards the result by appointing a Departmental or other Committee to inquire into the conditions under which poor relief is granted in the different parishes in Scotland.

(Answered by Mr. A. Graham Murray.) The attention of the Local Government Board has been drawn to the increase of pauperism in the large parishes, and they are at present engaged in collecting information as to the causes.

British Naval Display in the Streets of Rome.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he can state under what circumstances was a naval display carried out in the streets of Rome on Sunday, 19th June last; how many men of the Mediterranean squadron took part in it; who is responsible for the display; and had it the sanction of the Italian Government.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) The Admiralty have no information as to any naval display having been carried out in the streets of Rome on 19th June. The Commander in Chief reports that during the visit of the Fleet to Civita Vecchia, between the 15th and 22nd June, leave to visit Rome was given to all men of good character who wished to go there, and that large numbers availed themselves of the opportunity.

Appointment of Telegraph Boys to Rural Telegraph Offices.

Mr. MANSFIELD (Lincolnshire, Spalding): To ask the Postmaster-General whether it is proposed to appoint telegraph boys in all the rural postal telegraph offices; and, if so, whether, in view of the scale of remuneration received by rural postmasters, such appointments may either be made by the postmasters themselves or such messengers shall be selected from the postmaster's family wherever that is possible.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) It is not proposed to appoint regular telegraph messengers at all rural telegraph offices, but only at offices where they are found to be warranted. At offices where regular telegraph messengers are employed the boys are selected by the postmasters, subject to the approval of the district surveyor. At offices at which regular messengers are not employed it is not unusual for the delivery of telegrams to be made by members of the sub-postmaster's family.

Teaching of Hygiene in Schools.

Dr. THOMPSON (Monaghan, N.): To ask the Secretary to the Board of Education if his attention has been drawn to the recommendations of the deputation which waited, on Monday last, on the Marquess of Londonderry at the Education Office, on the importance of teaching elementary hygiene in the public schools of the country; and if, pending a comprehensive scheme of instruction in matters relating to public health, he will direct that the ten sanitary laws detailed by the President of the British Medical Association shall be tabulated and hung up in a prominent place in each school in Great Britain and Ireland.

(Answered by Sir William Anson.) The Board of Education are considering by what methods the satisfactory teaching of elementary hygiene may be best secured in the schools of the country. Amongst other things it is essential that the instruction should be given by properly qualified teachers. I am doubtful as to the educational value of the method proposed by the hon. Member. I must remind the hon. Member that the powers of the Board only extend to England and Wales.

Local Education Fund—Use of Surplus Money where Endowment Exceeds Education Rate.

Lord EDMUND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): To ask the Secretary to the Board of Education if they have decided what course should be pursued by a county council under Section 13, Sub-section 2, of the Education Act, 1902, when the moneys arising in any given year from an endowment, which is to be credited in aid of the rate in any parish, exceed the total annual amount raised by rate for the purposes of public elementary education in that parish; and if the Education Office has decided that the overseers of the parish are to apply the residue in aid of purposes other than education for which the poor rate is levied in the parish.

(Answered by Sir William Anson.) The Board have not had occasion to give a decision on the point referred to in the question, though it has been incidentally raised in a few cases, and it is doubtful whether they are competent to decide it authoritatively. As at present advised, the Board consider that the proper course is for the trustees to apply to the Board, who will consult with the loc education authority, for a scheme under the Charitable Trusts Acts to provide for the application of the surplus income remaining after defraying the education rate in the parish or parishes served by the school to educational purposes.

Naval Works at Rosyth.

Mr. SCOTT MONTAGU (Hampshire, New Forest): To ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether the projected naval works at Roseneath are being pushed forward or are stopped; and whether, in view of the fact that Roseneath forms the only naval base in the North Sea, such works will be continued with the least possible delay.

(Answered by Mr. Arthur Lee.) I presume Rosyth is intended. Good progress is being made with the necessary preliminary works and preparation of plans and estimates. It has not yet been possible to present a total Estimate to Parliament, and consequently money is not yet available for pushing on with the main scheme. No delay, however, has occurred, and there has been no change of policy with regard to this project.

German Officers' Visit to Devonport—Photographing Fortifications, Etc.

MR. SCOTT MONTAGU: To ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that German naval officers have photographed the fortifications and the dockyard at Devonport; and, if so, whether he proposes to take any action in the matter in the interests of our national defence; and will he say whether like facilities are granted to British officers in German naval ports.

(Answered by Mr. Arthur Lee.) Nothing is known of the occurrence referred to in the Question, but if anything of an improper nature had taken place it would have been reported by the responsible authorities.

National Expenditure for 1903-4.

MR. McKENNA (Monmouthshire, N.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can give under the customary headings the actual expenditure for the year ending 31st March, 1904.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) It is not clear what the hon. Member means by "actual expenditure under the customary headings." "Actual expenditure" is generally held to be the same as audited expenditure, the figures for which will not be available until the Appropriation Accounts are published next spring. The amounts issued from the Exchequer to meet expenditure for last year have been given in the Budget Statement under the main heads, and the amounts so issued to the various Civil Departments are given in the Annual Finance Accounts, which are being delivered to-day.

Revenue from Additional Duty on Goods Removed from Bond.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total amount of revenue derived by the Customs from the charge of 5s. additional per £100 of duty paid on dutiable goods removed from a Customs warehouse, and what amount of the total sum was realised from each article in the financial year ending the 31st March, 1904.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) The total amount derived by the Customs in the financial year 1903–4 from the statutory charge of 5s. per £100 of duty paid on goods cleared from Customs warehouses was £30,797, made up as follows, viz.:—

On chicory, cocoa, and coffee .	793
On dried fruit	876
On spirits, foreign	8,218
On tea	16,259
On wine	1,774
On sugar, etc.	2,877
Total . . .	£30,797

NOTE.—These amounts do not include the charges on Customs goods cleared from Excise warehouses (which are not referred to the Question), nor do they include £14,151 derived from the similar statutory charge of 2s. 6d. per cent. on tobacco.

Tibet Expedition—Relief of India of Cost Involved.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether, looking to the Imperial character which the expedition into Tibet has assumed, he will move His Majesty's Government to relieve India of the cost involved.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The Answer is in the negative. The Tibetan question is essentially an Indian interest.

Salary of Dr. Collins, of Ballinasloe.

Dr. THOMPSON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the Local Government Board for Ireland have refused to sanction the increase of salary granted to Dr. Collins, of Ballinasloe, seeing that this officer has had thirteen years service without a complaint; that his salary is now £15 a year less than it was when he was first appointed; and that the Local Government Board have quite recently sanctioned a salary of £150 to a medical officer of a much smaller dispensary district in the same neighbourhood.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) In answer to the first part of the Question, I refer to my reply to the similar Question of Wednesday last by the hon. Member for East Galway.† Dr. Collins was appointed dispensary medical officer in 1891, at a salary of £112 a year. His present salary is £120 a year, together with a small annual payment as compensation for reduction of income arising out of the operation of the Local Government Act of 1898. The district referred to at the end of the Question is wholly rural, and affords small scope for private practice. Dr. Collins resides in the town of Ballinasloe, and has good opportunities for private practice.

Colonel SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Commissioners of National Education have received a statement of the case of the principal teacher of Victoria Street National School, Lurgan (District 11, Roll No. 15,020), in which it is shown that the new system of fixed salaries, introduced in 1900, owing to the rapid increase in the average attendance, has resulted in a loss to the teacher of over £60 in the first three years, and that a teacher of the same service, standing, and qualifications, and the same average attendance, but whose attendance during the three years was normal, would receive about £900 more in salary before being pensioned than the teacher of the Victoria Street School; and, if so, whether in view of the statement of the Resident Commissioner that no teacher would lose a single penny by the change, the Commissioners, under Rule 200 (iii.) or otherwise, will give special consideration to this case, and increase the remuneration of the teacher to correspond with the increased average attendance of the school.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Commissioners do not admit the loss of income alleged by this teacher. On fixing his income under the present system the fact that the average attendance at the school was increasing rapidly was taken into consideration, and he was allowed not merely the average of his receipts for the three years ended 31st March, 1900, as his initial salary under the new system, but he got the benefit of Rule 200 (iii.) and was allowed a "normal" income of £100 per annum. This "normal" income represented the estimated value of his position at the time on the supposition that the old system of payments remained in force. The abolition of the old system of payments has resulted in an increase of the actual payments to national teachers generally of more than £40,000 per annum in three years. The teacher referred to was promoted to the second grade from 1st April, 1903, which carried with it an increased salary of £7 per annum. He is eligible for further triennial increases of good-service salary according to the prescribed scale and also for promotion, by which it is possible for him to reach an income of £175 per annum exclusive of the annual capitation payment from the school grant under the Irish Education Act, 1892, which payment is augmented by any increase in his average. His prospects are much better in every way under the new system than under the old. No such unqualified promise was given by the Resident Commissioner in regard to the salaries of teachers as stated in the Question.

Military Operations in Northern Nigeria.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the further despatch, expected two months and a half ago at an early date, has been received; and whether he can make public the details of the military operations which resulted about a year ago in the capture of Burmi in Northern Nigeria, and the death of the ex-Amir of Sokoto.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) The publication of the details of the military operations in question is at present under consideration.

Crime in Ceylon—Transportation instead of Capital Punishment.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will consider the advisability of substituting transportation to the Andaman Islands in cases of murder and serious crime in Ceylon, in view of the increase in cases of murder and manslaughter, as proved by Major de Wilton's Report on Prisons, Colombo, in his official Report, as various authorities have declared that such transportation would prove a greater deterrent than the taking of life.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) The question of transporting convicts from Ceylon to the Andaman Islands has been raised on various occasions; and though I will give the matter further consideration I am not, as at present advised, prepared to reconsider the decision of my predecessors, which has been adverse to the proposal.

Construction of Malay Peninsula Railway.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a convention has been concluded with the Sultan of Johore for the construction by the Federated Malay States of the last section of the Malay Peninsula private line of railway from a point on the main land opposite Penang to a point opposite Singapore; and, if not, whether an arrangement, described by Sir Frank Swettenham, of such vital importance to the Straits Settlements and the Protected Malay States, will be much longer delayed.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) A convention providing for the construction by the Federated Malay States of a railway through Johore in continuation of the main trunk line through those States was signed on the 11th instant.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Admiralty Contractors and Trades Unionism.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE (Bristol, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will make inquiry into the alleged discharge by Messrs. Lysaght, of Bristol, Government contractors, of workmen on account of their membership of a trade union, during the continuance of a running contract; and whether, if this be so, it is not a violation of the pledge given by Sir John Hibbert and the hon. Member for Poplar, on behalf of the Government, on 3rd August, 1893, in interpretation of the Fair Wages Resolution.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. PRETYMAN, Suffolk, Woodbridge): Inquiry has been made and Messrs. Lysaght state that the discharges referred to were due to shortness of orders, but that a preference was shown to non-union men. It is difficult to say whether this constitutes any breach of the undertaking referred to in the second part of the Question, but the Admiralty are prepared to do what they can to prevent any preference being shown by contractors as between unionists and non-unionists.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether on behalf of his Department he will make inquiry, or rather cause inquiry to be made, into the facts which are alleged in the Question, viz., that unionists were discharged on account of their membership of a trades union. I am prepared to bring evidence in support of that.

MR. PRETYMAN: Any evidence the hon. Member desires to put before the Admiralty will have most careful consideration, and inquiry will of course be made.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): What has been the form of the inquiry? Has it been personal or by correspondence?

MR. PRETYMAN: As I indicated in my Answer, Messrs. Lysaght have been asked for an explanation, and the one they supplied I have communicated to the House.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: If my hon. friend brings evidence, as he says he is prepared to do, will the hon. Gentleman make personal inquiry?

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe): And will he make inquiry from the officials of the unions to which the men discharged belong?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member has said he will make inquiry.

War Office Contractors and Trades Unionism.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he will make inquiry into the alleged discharge by Messrs. Lysaght, of Bristol, Government contractors, of workmen, on account of their membership of a trade union, during the continuance of a running contract; whether, if this be so, it is a violation of the pledge given by Sir John Hibbert and the hon. Member for Poplar, on behalf of the Government, on 3rd August, 1893, in interpretation of the Fair Wages Resolution.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BROMLEY DAVENPORT, Cheshire, Macclesfield): Inasmuch as no instructions were issued to the War Office consequent upon the debate referred to, it would appear that the promise then given was not intended to apply to the War Department. The Department, however, does not recognise nor approve of any preference for or against trades unionists as such, and I am willing to agree that measures shall be taken to prevent contractors engaged upon War Office work from dismissing men solely for the reason that they are or are not members of a trade union.

Army Horses and Epizootic Lymphangitis.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether horses belonging to the Woolwich Garrison are suffering or have recently suffered from epizootic lymphangitis; and whether it is proposed to employ any of the horses from this garrison on manœuvres.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: There are at present forty-four horses suffering from epizootic lymphangitis in the Woolwich Garrison, of which twenty-seven are convalescent and seventeen still under treatment. No horses will be taken to the manœuvres from units which have had a case of lymphangitis within two months of the date of the commencement of the manœuvres.

Chinese Coolies in the Transvaal—Desertions from the Compounds.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies how many Chinese coolies have deserted from the Transvaal mines on which they were employed; whether all who escaped have been arrested; whether any have been charged before a magistrate, and whether any punishments have been inflicted; whether any persons have been charged, under the provisions of the Labour Importation Ordinance, with the offence of harbouring or concealing an escaped labourer; and, if he has no information on these points, whether he will ask Lord Milner for particulars.

The following Question also appeared on the Paper—

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now in a position to make any statement relative to the desertion of two Chinese coolies from the New Comet Mine at Johannesburg, and the desertion of fifteen coolies on the way to Pretoria; and, if not, whether he will ask for particulars from Lord Milner.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): I have not received information on these points, but I have already stated that I will ask Lord Milner for particulars.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): When will the right hon. Gentleman ask Lord Milner for particulars? I have been asking that for the last ten days.

MR. LYTTELTON: The letter was written yesterday.

Treatment of Chinese Coolies on Landing in South Africa.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has yet received the despatch from Lord Milner, asked for by cable on 23rd June, relative to the arrival and landing at Durban of coolies from the steamship "Tweeddale" and their transmission to Johannesburg; and, if so, whether he will state the terms of Lord Milner's report.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have not yet received the despatch in question.

DR. MACNAMARA: When may we expect it?

MR. LYTTELTON: In about a month from the 25th June.

Administration of Native Affairs in the Transvaal.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Department of Native Affairs in the Transvaal is now being reduced; whether the services of three out of six Native Commissioners have been dispensed with; and whether the functions of the Native Commissioners are being entrusted to the resident magistrates; and, if so, will he state what steps His Majesty's Government took before sanctioning these arrangements to satisfy itself that they are not prejudical to the interests of the native population in the Transvaal.

MR. LYTTELTON: Owing to the necessity of dealing with a large native population scattered and unsettled by war, a larger establishment was created at first than will be required in normal conditions, and, to avoid overlapping, some reductions are taking place. The necessity of sympathetic administration by magistrates fully qualified by experience is, I am aware, fully appreciated by Lord Milner.

Tithe Reform in Macedonia.

MR. HUGH LAW (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the schemes of tithe reform, stated to have been adopted by the Porte for application to certain villages in Macedonia, embrace control by the Civil Assessors or European officers.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl PERCY, Kensington, S.): Two schemes of tithe reform have been under consideration, but we are not aware that a final decision has yet been arrived at.

Swiss Lace sold at Nice as Irish.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the statement in the Nice Consular Report that lace made in Switzerland is sold at Nice as Irish-made lace; and whether he proposes to take any, and, if so, what steps to safeguard the interests of this Irish industry.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds Central): I have seen a statement in the Report of His Majesty's Consul at Nice that Irish lace appears to be counterfeited at St. Gall in Switzerland. Inquiries will be made on the subject.

Statistical Abstract of the United Kingdom.

SIR JOHN LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade why the Statistical Abstract of the United Kingdom for the year ending December, 1902, was only issued on 9th September, 1903; why the Abstract for the year 1903 has not yet been issued; and whether there is any prospect of its being available on an early day.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The date of issue of the Statistical Abstract depends on the date of receipt by the Board of Trade of the particulars supplied to them for the purpose by other Departments including the financial statements for the year ending 31st March. It is hoped that the Abstract may be published in August this year, and every effort will be made to expedite its issue.

Borstal Convict Prison—Attack on Warders.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the circumstances attending the sentencing of a convict last Wednesday at Maidstone to twelve months further imprisonment with hard labour for an attack on a warder at Borstal Prison; whether he has noted the fact that the prisoner stated that the warder in question habitually kicked the food into the prisoner's cell; and that on resenting this, he, the prisoner, was beaten with staves by warders to an extent which necessitated the bandaging of his arm by the doctor; and whether, in view of this particular case, and of the frequent attacks on warders at, and attempted escapes from, Borstal during the last few years, he will order an inquiry into the whole question of the conduct of Borstal Prison.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): With regard to the first allegation to which the hon. Member refers, inquiry was made at the time and no reason was found for believing what the convict said as to the manner in which his food was served to him. As a matter of fact, the warder he assaulted was not in charge of his cell and did not serve his dinner. The convict's second allegation is incorrect. When brought into the prison after arrest he complained of pain in his arm, and a cold-water bandage was applied by the medical officer; but the injury, if any, was caused in the struggle to stop the assault and effect the arrest, and had nothing to do with the service of his food. Assaults on prison warders are unfortunately inevitable incidents of any large convict establishment where large bodies of criminals—many of them violent and desperate men—have to be kept in association under the control of a small body of warders. The assault to which the hon. Member refers was a murderous one, and could only be properly dealt with by being brought before a Judge of Assize. Though the situation of Borstal makes the number of attempts by convicts to escape somewhat larger than at other prisons, the reports of violence by convicts during the last ten years have been fewer there than at other convict prisons, and in my opinion no inquiry into the discipline is called for. I am satisfied that the administration of the prison is well-conducted.

Birmingham Mint and Silver Coinage for the Crown Colonies.

MR. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of the Treasury what amount of silver coinage for the Crown Colonies has recently been struck at the Mint, Birmingham, and for what Colonies; and whether any commission has been paid on the above coinage to the Crown Agents for the Colonies.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH, Derbyshire, W.): No silver coinage for the Crown Colonies has been struck at the Mint, Birmingham, for upwards of four years.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): Has any commission been paid to the Crown Agents?

MR. MARKHAM: Not copper coinage?

Fraudulent Whisky.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider the advisability of in future separating in the annual Revenue Returns the quantities of pot-still whisky distilled in Ireland and Scotland as distinguished from patent spirits distilled in Ireland, Scotland, and England, with a view to facilitating the work of inspectors in prosecuting under the Food and Drugs Act the owners of tied houses who fraudulently compel their tenants to sell English patent spirit as genuine Irish and Scotch whisky.

Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH: The Returns of the Inland Revenue Department do not distinguish between pot-still and patent-still spirit, the difference being one that has no bearing upon the levying of duty; nor do I think that such information, even if obtainable in future, would facilitate identification of spirits after they have left the control of the Inland Revenue and when they are on sale by retailers.

Mr. MACVEAGH: Am I to understand that the Government actually do nothing to prevent the sale of English patent spirit as Scotch or Irish whisky?

Whisky in Bond.

Mr. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if all home made spirits, whether Irish whisky, Scotch whisky, blended whisky, patent spirits made in Scotland, Ireland, or England, are permitted as plain British spirit; if the nature of the contents of all casks in bonded warehouses are known to the Revenue officials; and, if so, will he consider the desirability of stating on the permits which are attached by the officials to all casks leaving bond what the contents actually are.

Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH: The Answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative and to the second in the negative. Accordingly, the third point mentioned by him does not arise.

Forest Gate Barrack School.

Mr. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that the West Ham Board of Guardians propose to purchase from the Poplar Guardians for the accommodation of the children at present housed in the West Ham Workhouse Schools, the already condemned barrack school at Forest Gate; and if he can give an assurance that such a step will not receive the sanction of the Local Government Board.

The SECRETARY to the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Grant Lawson, Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I understand that the West Ham Guardians have been in communication with the Poplar Guardians on this subject, but I have not at present had to determine whether the proposed purchase should be sanctioned. If an application for sanction should be made to me I will give the matter careful consideration before arriving at a decision with regard to it.

Mr. LOUGH: Can the purchase be made without the sanction of the Local Government Board?

Mr. GRANT LAWSON: No, Sir.

Mr. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether the Bradford Wages Commission Report will be laid upon the Table of the House before the 15th July.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Lord Stanley, Lancashire, Westhoughton): I propose to lay the Report of the Bradford Committee on the Table of the House on Friday.

Irish Degree of Bachelor of Arts.

Mr. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the total number of candidates from the Queen's Colleges of Belfast, Cork, and Galway, and Magee College, Derry, who have taken the degree of B.A. at the Royal University during the past five years; and the total number from Kelvin House, Belfast, who have done so during the same period.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Wyndham, Dover): I have communicated this information to the hon. Member. It will also be printed with to-day's Votes.

Queen's College, Belfast.

*Mr. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the cost of the mosaics in the entrance hall of Queen's College, Belfast, and in the library, and of the organ placed in the examination hall; and whether, in view of the demand for further funds for science teaching and original research, he can state from what fund the cost of the mosaics and organ was defrayed.

Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH: The pavement (not mosaic) of the entrance hall and library cost £29, charged to the Vote for the maintenance of the College. The organ was presented to the College by a Belfast family.

Queen's College, Belfast, Scholarships.

*Mr. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if any scholarships have lapsed in Queen's College, Belfast, during the past ten years; and, if so, whether he can state their value and to what purpose the money thus accruing has been applied.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Occasionally scholarships are not awarded at Belfast College, as in the case of all Colleges and Universities. There is no available information of the number and value of such scholarships. The disposal of monies accruing through their non-award is strictly regulated by the College statutes.

*Mr. MACVEAGH: Is the reason because there are not sufficient capable students?

Mr. WYNDHAM: That is one of the reasons.

Estates Commissioners—Inspectors.

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of inspectors employed under the Estates Commissioners, the provinces from which they have been taken; and whether, without exception, they are Protestants.

Mr. WYNDHAM: There are twenty-two inspectors on the staff of the Estates Commissioners, all of whom had previously been employed as assistant land commissioners. Eleven resided in Ulster at the time of their appointment as inspectors; seven in Leinster, and four in Munster. The Estates Commissioners have no knowledge of their religious denominations.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a Parliamentary Return has been issued, giving a list of the Commissioners, and that in each case the religion is stated?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am not aware of that.

Mr. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): If the religion is stated in the Return how is it the information has not been supplied to the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am not aware that it is so stated.

Lettir (Kerry) School.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in consequence of delay in producing the new plans for school building and of the poverty of the district, the work of erecting a school in Lettir, county Kerry, has been in abeyance for a number of years; and whether, in view of these circumstances, the National Board will contribute something more than the usual two-thirds of the cost, and thereby enable the manager to build a school under the old plans in accordance with the claims of the parents.

Mr. WYNDHAM: In this case the manager elected to postpone the erection of a school-house pending a decision on the question of the revision of the plans and estimates. The Commissioners offered to make a grant under the old regulations in March, 1902. They have no power to make a grant exceeding two-thirds of the estimated cost.

Keelnabrach School, Kerry.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the manager of the Keelnabrach School at Glenbeigh, county Kerry, reported to the National Board that the loft was in a dangerous condition, and applied for a grant to build a new school in December, 1902; can he state why the grant was not given; and on whom the responsibility will rest in case an accident occurs, consequent on the condition of the present school building.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The manager applied for a grant for a new school-house. The Commissioners were prepared to make a grant under the old regulations, but he elected to await the issue of the expected new regulations. It is for the manager and other persons interested to adopt such precautions as may be needful for the safety of the children in attendance at the school. No responsibility in this respect attaches to the Commissioners.

Teaching of the Irish Language in Irish Schools.

Captain DONELAN (Cork County, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that the teaching of Irish has been admitted into the ordinary programme in Irish national schools, the special payments which were made when it was taught as a special subject will still be given.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Special fees are paid for instruction in Irish as an extra subject outside school hours. The teaching of Irish during school hours in accordance with the programme issued in April last is no bar to the payment of such special fees.

Case of Constable Anderson.

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will furnish the hon. Member for East Mayo with a certified copy of the evidence taken during the Court of inquiry into the charges against Constable Anderson, at Kiltimagh, in December last.

The following Question on the same subject also appeared on the Paper—

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table a copy of all Correspondence which has passed between the Government authorities in Dublin and Mr. Maurice, the solicitor for Constable Anderson, since the holding of the Court of inquiry in December last.

Mr. WYNDHAM: There is no precedent, so far as I can discover, for laying the proceedings of a Court of inquiry, or an appeal made to the Inspector-General by a solicitor on behalf of his client. I see grave objections to creating such a precedent and am not prepared to do so.

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is no precedent also for the condition of things that exists in connection with this case?

Irish Salt Firkin Butter Industry.

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of prosecutions, with the result, which have been instituted in Ireland for excessive moisture in salt firkin butter, where the analysis showed it did not exceed 20 per cent., since the Committee of last session, to whom the Butter Bill was referred, agreed to allow a maximum of 20 per cent. in salt firkin butter; and whether, seeing that the Butter Bill introduced this session contains the same provision, he will call the attention of the Irish Board of Agriculture and the police, acting as food inspectors, to the matter.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The number and results of such prosecutions are not officially recorded, and to obtain the information it would be necessary to communicate with the police throughout Ireland. Under existing statutory regulations where the proportion of water in butter exceeds 16 per cent., it is presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the butter is not genuine. The Department of Agriculture is aware of the proposal in the Bill referred to, to exempt Irish salt firkin butter from the 16 per cent. limit. But the hon. Member is doubtless aware that the Council of Agriculture by a majority of forty-seven votes to seven recently adopted a resolution to the effect that any such exemption, if made, would most injuriously affect the reputation of Irish butter generally. The Kerry County Council has also passed a somewhat similar resolution.

Mr. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that on the 21st of last month a prosecution was instituted against a man at Pallas Grean for having 18 per cent. of moisture in his butter, and that the magistrates on the bench unanimously dismissed it?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am aware that the case was dismissed on a technical point. I am also aware that a certain number of hon. Members representing certain districts in Ireland hold an opinion contrary to that held by a large number of hon. Members representing other parts of Ireland in regard to the question of moisture in butter—a question which I think can only be settled by legislation.

Mr. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Consultative Board of the Agricultural Association—Sir H. Plunkett's Department—are trying to override the decision?

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now arguing the matter.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY (Limerick, W.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Limerick County Council and certain district councils have passed resolutions in favour of exempting salt butter from——?

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Mr. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the object of the circular of the Board of Agriculture is to deliberately kill the salt firkin butter trade?

*Mr. SPEAKER: That is not in order.

Mr. FLAVIN: Nothing but creameries will do for Sir Horace Plunkett. I promise the right hon. Gentleman he will hear more of this.

Donegal Homespuns.

Mr. HUGH LAW: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the sale both in this country and abroad of machine-made cloths of inferior quality as Donegal homespuns; and whether any steps are being taken to put a stop to this practtice.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Such sales would seem to constitute an offence against the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, and if any specific cases of the kind are brought under the notice of the Department, it will be prepared to take such action as it may be advised.

Salters' Company's Trust at Magherafelt.

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in 1899 the Salters' Company of London conveyed to certain trustees in Magherafelt, county Derry, the old Court-house and bridewell, the markets, and certain other property to hold in trust for the town of Magherafelt upon certain conditions; and that apart from an annual payment of £120 to two local schools and the handing over £100 to the Magherafelt Gas Company, no other disbursements have been made by the trustees; and whether, in view of the desire of the inhabitants that the money in the hands of the trustees should be spent for the benefit and improvement of the town, a local inquiry will be ordered in order to ascertain the conditions under which the trust was made over, its present value, and the best means of securing that it shall be administered for the benefit, and according to the wish, of the people of Magherafelt.

Mr. WYNDHAM: As far as I have been able to ascertain, the Salters' Company assigned certain property to trustees to be used for certain purposes. This trust has been faithfully carried out. I have no power whatever to institute such an inquiry as suggested, or to compel owners of property to dedicate it to purposes other than those to which they desire to devote it.

Collierstown Evicted Tenant.

Mr. SHEEHY (Meath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether an evicted tenant, Frederick Morres, applied to the Estates Commissioners to be reinstated in his holding in Collierstown, county Meath; whether the farm is untenanted; and what steps, if any, have the Commissioners taken to meet his application.

MR. WYNDHAM: An application has been received from this evicted tenant, and will be considered by the Estates Commissioners.

Bangor (County Down) Post Office.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that discontent exists amongst the inhabitants of Bangor, county Down, with the post office accommodation there; and that representations have already been made to the postal authorities complaining of the inconvenience caused to the residents owing to the limited proportions of the present post office; and whether, in view of the needs of this growing community in the matter of post office accommodation, immediate steps will be taken to have a new building erected.

LORD STANLEY: A representation was made early this year upon this subject by the Urban District Council of Bangor (county Down), when I pointed out to them that the office was provided as recently as 1901, and that the accommodation was still ample to meet the requirements of the public at normal times. I do not consider that a new office is necessary at present.

Transvaal Administration.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state when and how His Majesty's Government propose to give practical effect to the reply of the Colonial Secretary, on 20th May, to the Resolutions against Chinese labour of both branches of the Federal Legislature of the Commonwealth of Australia, namely, that His Majesty's Government adhere to the policy of treating the Transvaal as a self-governing colony so far as its internal affairs are concerned where Imperial interests are not involved.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The policy to which the hon. Gentleman refers has been adhered to in the past and is being adhered to at the present.

DR. MACNAMARA: Do I understand that the Transvaal is at the present time a self-governing colony?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; that has never been asserted by the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

DR. MACNAMARA: Will the right hon. Gentleman look at the despatch of 20th May, where the Colonial Secretary specifically makes that statement?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A self-governing colony? I think the hon. Gentleman is mistaken.

DR. MACNAMARA: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the despatch of 20th May, in which the Colonial Secretary says, "His Majesty's Government adhere to the policy of treating the Transvaal as a self-governing colony."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: From that sentence it is clear that it is not a self-governing colony.

MR. MARKHAM: Will the Prime Minister wire to the Government of Australia to send to this House——

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That does not arise on this Question.

MR. MARKHAM: I think, Sir, you will see that it does, if you allow me to finish the Question.

MR. SPEAKER: I am quite sure that it does not.

The Colonial Office Vote.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now state definitely when the Colonial Office Vote will be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he could not fix a date for the Colonial Vote, but he would give as long notice of any arrangement as he could.

Sir HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) reminded the right hon. Gentleman that that Bench had asked that the Colonial Vote might be taken on Thursday, the 21st inst.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman has put his supplementary Question under a misapprehension. Neither I nor the Bench opposite can foresee with certainty the course of business in the next few days. If the request is repeated when it can be foreseen, it will be treated, as I have always treated requests from that quarter, with the utmost consideration.

Education (Defaulting Authorities) Bill.

Mr. MANSFIELD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, instead of proceeding with the Education (Defaulting Authorities) Bill, he will consider the advisability of introducing a short measure giving to England and Wales the same conditions of popular control as are provided in the Scotch Education Bill.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The popular control given in Scotland to the local authorities carried with it, as one of its essential elements, the right to give out of the rates denominational education in school hours in what in England are provided schools. As I understand, the Opposition have scouted the idea of denominational religion being taught within school hours even at the cost of the denomination, and as I further understand the sole ground, if there be a ground, for passive resistance, is that it is alleged that under the existing Act denominational education is given at the cost of the rates. Therefore, if the Scotch system were introduced into England, it is manifest it would offend the Opposition as an organised body of public opinion, and it would do nothing to conciliate passive resisters.

Dr. MACNAMARA: May I ask the Prime Minister why Scotland is always to be treated as an educationally favoured nation?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: If it be an educational favour to a nation to have denominational religion taught out of the rates, that is a privilege I shall be glad to extend to this country.

Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the educational privilege that every community shall have a popularly-governed school in its area?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It depends on what conditions. The full popular control given in Scotland is, I understand, repulsive to the right hon. Gentleman's conscientious convictions.

Mr. BRYCE again rose, but——

*Mr. SPEAKER said he really thought this debate, for such it was becoming, must be continued on some other occasion.

Mr. BRYCE said he merely desired to make an explanation—namely, that he disclaimed the interpretation of the right hon. Gentleman.

Army Reform—The Secretary for War's Statement.

Sir A. HAYTER (Walsall) asked on what Vote the Secretary for War would make his statement on Army Reform?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY of the TREASURY (Sir A. Acland-Hood, Somersetshire, Wellington) said the statement of the Secretary of State for War to-morrow would be made on the War Office Vote, that being the desire, he understood, of hon. Members opposite. He hoped it would be possible to take Vote 8 afterwards, but he expected the discussion on the statement would occupy a considerable time.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): There are one or two points on that which I desire to put to the First Lord of the Treasury. Will the statement of the Secretary of State for War affect the question of the organisation of the War Office as well as the question of the organisation of the Army, which are two quite distinct matters? I have on many occasions, with the assent of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, requested that a delay should take place before the House is called upon either to pronounce its opinion or even to discuss the statement of the Secretary of State for War. The subject-matter of the statement must occupy a good deal of time, and I think it is only reasonable that there should be an opportunity for a full and well-informed discussion on the matter.

SIR A. HAYTER: As the Militia may be affected, could not that Vote be put down to enable a discussion on a later day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be unreasonable to ask the House to confine the discussion of the statement of my right hon. friend to to-morrow alone. A second opportunity must clearly be granted. I do not think it would be desirable that that second discussion should be taken under conditions which might restrict its area and limit the field with which the Secretary of State might have to deal to-morrow. I cannot answer the right hon. Gentleman's Question as to the exact ambit of my right hon. friend's statement. I do not know whether he will refer in detail to War Office re-organisation, though I think it is exceedingly probable that he will refer to it. I think, however, I ought not to make any statement on that matter in the absence of my right hon. friend.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL (Oldham) asked whether there would be another opportunity this session?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: An early opportunity?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Now observe. I am told that, under pains and penalties of all sorts, I must give an early opportunity for the discussion of the Colonial Vote, and now I am asked to give an early opportunity for the discussion of this matter. I will do my best, but I cannot do more.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection: That they had discharged the following Members from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures:—Mr. Baird and Mr. Hunter Craig, and had appointed in substitution, Mr. Seymour Ormsby-Gore and Mr. Edward Mitchell.

Report to lie upon the Table.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 5.

Amendment again proposed—

"In page 3, line 27, to leave out Sub-section (2)."—(Mr. Levy.)

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CARSON, Dublin University) explained that the delegation of powers by quarter sessions was the most convenient method of carrying out the functions of the county licensing committee abolished by the last clause. The power of appointment would be with quarter sessions, and there was no intention to interfere with that power; the Home Secretary would only make the rules under which the justices to whom the duties would be delegated would act as a standing committee. There seemed to be an idea that the Home Secretary was being given too wide powers in connection with the appointment of the committee. That was not so. He would only be able to lay down rules regulating the appointment; the actual appointment itself would be left to quarter sessions.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) hoped that the hon. Member would not persist in pressing the Amendment. In early parts of the debate hon. Gentlemen opposite had found fault with the Government for limiting the discretion of the justices in quarter sessions yet now they were asking the House to accept an Amendment which would prevent them handing over their business to a committee of men who would probably be experts, and consequently thoroughly well qualified to deal with licensing matters. He noted that hon. Members opposite were by no means agreed on this point.

MR. LEVY (Leicestershire, Loughborough) asked leave to withdraw the Amendment but it was refused.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S. W.) thought the Amendment if carried would bring about a worse state of affairs than now existed, by subjecting the whole quarter sessions bench to pressure from political quarters with regard to the grant and renewal of licences. It was most desirable to avoid the introduction of Party politics.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs), rising to a point of order, asked, was not the question simply whether the Amendment should be withdrawn?

*THE CHAIRMAN said several of the right hon. Gentleman's supporters having refused to allow the withdrawal, the discussion necessarily proceeded.

MR. GALLOWAY asked what would be the effect of the acceptance of the Amendment?

SIR EDWARD CARSON: The quarter sessions will alone operate.

MR. J. F. HOPE (Sheffield, Brightside) said he wished to put one Question to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) said, if it was competent for him to do so, he moved that the Question be now put.

*THE CHAIRMAN did not accept the Motion.

MR. J. F. HOPE asked why the first part of the sub-section was optional and the second part mandatory?

SIR EDWARD CARSON replied that in the opinion of the Government, the subsidiary duties mentioned ought to be delegated to the committee.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Levy and Dr. Hutchinson.

MR. WORSLEY-TAYLOR (Lancashire, Blackpool) moved that the rules governing the appointment of committees should be made by quarter sessions, subject to approval by the Secretary of State. He thought that, having regard to the large powers entrusted to quarter sessions, there was no reason why they should not formulate their own rules.

Amendment proposed——

"In page 3, line 29, after the word 'made,' to insert the words 'by them to be approved by a Secretary of State.'"—(Mr. Worsley-Taylor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said the Government did not think the matter a very important one. If there was any feeling among hon. Members that these rules should be made by quarter sessions rather than by the Home Secretary, he would have no objection. He would say, however, that as the great majority of the rules under the Bill must necessarily be made by the Home Secretary, and as it was of great importance to have some kind of similarity in the various rules, he doubted whether there was any advantage in making the change. Still, if the hon. Member thought it worth while pressing the Amendment he would not oppose it.

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.) pointed out that the county licensing committee, although appointed and regulated by statute, had power to make rules regarding their procedure, and surely it was not unreasonable to ask that a body like the quarter sessions should have similar power. If it was desired to lay down universal rules as to the constitution of the committee, it should be done in the Bill itself. There was too much legislation attempted by Government Departments at present.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) said he preferred the Bill as it stood. The point was a small one and they had better pass to other questions in the consideration of which their time could be more usefully occupied.

MR. LLOYD WHARTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon) suggested that quarter sessions should be allowed to make their own rules, provided that they submitted them to the Home Office for approval.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: I accept the Amendment.

MR. WHITLEY (Halifax) asked if it would be in the power of the quarter sessions to appoint on the committee magistrates interested in the trade.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: No, Sir.

MR. WHITLEY: Thank you.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 29, after the word 'Act,' to insert the words 'providing for the mode of appointment, number, quorum, and procedure of committees.'" — (Mr. Worsley Taylor.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 29, after the word 'and,' to insert the words 'except in a county borough.'" — (Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. HELME (Lancashire, Lancaster) moved to add words excepting also those non-county boroughs which have a separate commission of the peace and a population of over 25,000. He reminded the Committee that on the previous day the Government were good enough to grant powers with regard to new licences to magistrates in non-county boroughs. He now asked them to go a step further. A Committee of hon. Members sitting on both sides of the House had carefully gone into this question, and they found that out of 177 non-county boroughs having a separate commission of the peace there were many too small to have a separate compensation fund. It had therefore been decided to suggest that non-county boroughs with a separate commission of the peace and a population of over 25,000 should be entrusted with the entire control of the licensed houses within their boundaries. It was well understood that actual knowledge of a district was the foundation upon which successful local government was conducted. This was not a Party question, but administrative. It had been suggested that if this Amendment were conceded it would mean taking the gem out of its surroundings, and that the county area would be deprived of large sums which would otherwise be available for compensation. But was it not the fact that it was in the urban district that the overplus of the licensed houses existed, rather than in the county districts? As the House had already accepted the principle of dealing with county boroughs apart from the administrative County areas of which they formed part, so he urged they should also accept the principle that local self government should be conceded to non-county boroughs with regard to licensing. He had put down an amendment to secure a provision for the automatic inclusion of other boroughs as their populations increased to 25,000. He strongly appealed to the Government to accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 29, after the words last inserted, to insert the words 'or a borough having a separate commission of the peace and a population of over twenty-five thousand.'"—(Mr. Helme.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE hoped the Government before accepting this Amendment would consider the general position of county areas. It was the old story. First the Government made a concession to one class, then another class began to exert pressure, and, if this went on, the whole county area would be whittled away. This was not a question of jurisdiction, it was a question of money. He reminded the Committee that this was a question of administering a fund, and that the county would be left in an unfair position if the Government listened to many appeals for the exclusion of boroughs from the county area. The compensation fund would be largely raised from the boroughs, which the Amendment proposed to exclude from the area. The licensed houses in these boroughs were largely supported by country people. In some old-fashioned market towns there might be a congestion of licensed houses, but as their population did not reach 25,000 they would be left in the area, but there were other non-county boroughs steadily growing and thriving where there was no excess of licensed premises and these were to be taken out of the area. That was where the unfairness came in.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) declared that county boroughs were to enjoy this privilege on the basis of their local knowledge and administration, and he pointed out that there were no less than twelve county boroughs with populations of less than 25,000. Why should not Canterbury, he asked, be treated as an autonomous area, unless, of course, it was because it was in Kent? He reminded the Committee that they had the precedent of the Education Act where the population was fixed at 10,000; and, dealing with the objection that the area would not be sufficient for the purpose of raising an adequate compensation fund, he referred to the unanimous opinion of the non-county borough Members that the area would be sufficient. He hoped the point would be conceded by the Government.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland) said that, in his opinion, the Amendment of his hon. friend did not go far enough. He thought that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Somerset was valid, and that reform was needed in non-county boroughs even more than in the large cities. Although they might not have a superfluity of public-houses, reform was necessary; and, therefore, they ought to be given autonomy. It was rather an arbitrary and unnecessary line that was drawn by his hon. friend in selecting a population of 25,000; and he would later propose that 10,000 be substituted. Under the Education Act autonomy was given to boroughs of that size for the purposes of secondary education. There were a large number of boroughs which felt very bitterly at being deprived of direct control over their own licences. He thought the Government would be well advised to offend as little as possible these important local authorities.

DR. HUTCHINSON (Sussex, Rye) said that difficulties would arise in many boroughs. For instance, part of Tunbridge Wells was in Kent and part in Sussex. It had a very efficient borough bench, and no complaint regarding it had been made. It was very hard that it had in one instance to apply to quarter sessions in Kent and in another instance to quarter sessions in Sussex. Such an anomaly ought to be put an end to. All they wanted was to allow those boroughs to work out their own salvation in their own way.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said it was difficult to draw the line in these cases. There might be no valid reason why a borough with 49,000 inhabitants should be treated differently to a borough with 50,000 inhabitants. But the line had to be drawn. The only question was the provision of a proper compensation area; and it was important that it should not be too small. If it were too small there would not be sufficient funds to effect a desirable reduction of licences. The Government went very carefully into the matter, and were very anxious to meet the views of the borough councils in the matter. The figures, however, showed that, if the Amendment were accepted, the amount of compensation available would in some cases be too small to be effective, while in other cases it would be more than adequate having regard to the existing number of public-houses, and would probably be more than would be used. The latter cases would, however, diminish the effectiveness of the fund in the county at large. Therefore, if the Amendment were accepted, in some cases the compensation area would be too small, and in other cases it would be too large, and it would reduce the fund available for the county generally. The only really feasible and practical way of setting up a compensation fund was by the means proposed in the Bill. Several representations had been made to the Government; and the Government had put back the licensing system in this particular, exactly as it was before. They had gone a step further, and had put down an Amendment providing for the representation of non-county boroughs. It was to insert—

> "In page 4, line 8, after the word 'committees,' to insert the words 'of quarter sessions and for the constitution of those committees where requisite as standing committees, and also for the addition to those committees in the case of a county, of representatives of the justices of any boroughs within the county not being county boroughs, but having a separate commission of the peace.'"

That would, he thought, meet the desire of the non-county boroughs. He could assure the Committee that the acceptance of the Amendment would render ineffective the compensation fund in many cases.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) said that he was very glad that the Government intended to make some provision for the representation of non-county boroughs. He intended, however, to move an Amendment giving the boroughs a statutory right to representation. If those boroughs were not represented at quarter sessions, the Court would be dealing with areas from which it had on representation. There was nothing in the Amendment mentioned by the Solicitor-General which would give non-county boroughs a claim to representation. Some of the worst cases in the country were the cases of little market towns, many of which had a public-house for every hundred of the population. These houses supplied fairs and markets on certain days, but for the rest they had to be kept going by the local population. If the borough justices had not the right of representation they would not be summoned. The average county justice looked down on the borough justice. He thought the hon. Member for the Ripon Division would agree to that.

Mr. LLOYD WHARTON said he could assure the hon. Gentleman he never looked down on any one.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said it was not always those who had the right who looked down on people. Why should not the Solicitor-General put this right of representation into Clause 5 instead of Clause 6?

Sir EDWARD CARSON said that the Home Secretary would be empowered to make rules; but if the hon. Gentleman did not think that that was sufficient he would be prepared to introduce other words.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said the Amendment which he would suggest was: "When constituting the committee under this section every non-county borough having a separate commission of the peace shall be represented thereon."

Sir EDWARD CARSON: I should like to consider that, and I can assure the hon. Member I will try to meet him on Report.

*Sir JAMES WOODHOUSE (Huddersfield) said there was a very strong feeling on this matter amongst the non-county boroughs because they considered the Bill deprived them of an autonomy they now possessed. They had always exercised the jurisdiction which the Bill sought to dispossess them of. There was no allegation that the magistrates had discharged their duties improperly or imprudently. It was therefore a strong thing on the part of the Government to bring in a Bill to deprive them of the jurisdiction they had. The reason given was that it might affect the distribution of the compensation fund which would be derived from the counties in which they were scheduled, but if there was any argument in that at all, it was in favour of maintaining the existing state of things. If there were redundant licences they would exist in these small boroughs and not in the scattered country districts, and the larger amount of the contribution to the compensation fund in the counties would be derived from these boroughs and not from the other portions of the county. Scarborough, with a population of 33,000, would contribute £2,056 as a non-county borough population, but if the Amendment were agreed to the amount available for the Scarborough Quarter Sessions for compensation would be £773. Whether they were compensated on the basis of the proportion of population, the levy on licences, or on the assessable value, the result would be the same—they would only receive back a third of what they contributed to the fund. Under these circumstances he thought there had been no solid argument for removing from non-county boroughs the jurisdiction they possessed.

Mr. FISON (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) as the representative of a non-county borough thanked the Government for the way in which the non-county boroughs had been treated. In the West Riding of Yorkshire there were a dozen non-county boroughs and he did not see how quarter sessions was to be kept an efficient body if they were constantly adding to their body the representatives of these non-county boroughs. He thought the present appeal from the licensing authorities of the non-county boroughs to the quarter sessions was the most efficient way of dealing with the matter.

*Mr. THEODORE TAYLOR (Lancashire, Radcliffe) hoped the Government would go further than they had done. Knowing something about the small non-county boroughs in the West Riding of Yorkshire, he might say that there were many with over 25,000 inhabitants who would lose their jurisdiction. It was sought by this Amendment to confirm to these boroughs the jurisdiction they had hitherto possessed. At present the borough justices had no title to sit at quarter sessions. True, the Government had at last promised to give them some kind of representation at quarter sessions, but that was not enough. Knowing something of these non-county boroughs, he said the areas were large enough to form a compensation fund and would make a homogeneous area over which the compensation money could be spent. There was a very strong case in Lancashire and Yorkshire for this Amendment, and he put it to the Government it was only fair treatment to mete out to these areas. In his view the borough magistrates had as much right to sit in review at quarter sessions on their own decisions as had county justices. No doubt borough justices were looked down upon as inferior beings, but since the Local Government Act which created every chairman of an urban district council a county magistrate that objection against borough justices no longer held good. He should vote for this Amendment as a very necessary step in devolution. He hoped that, as in the case of other measures, such as the Education Act, the larger non-county boroughs of from 25,000 to 50,000 inhabitants would receive, what he regarded as a mere matter of justice, the consideration to which they were entitled.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick) said that if the Amendment were accepted as it stood it would still leave in their anomalous and unsatisfactory condition some of the smaller non-county boroughs. He was one of those who, in regard to the Education Act, felt the great importance of not confusing the area by making exceptions within it. He saw the force of the Government contention that it was desirable to have a homogeneous and large area for dealing with compensation, but in this case community of interest and feeling would not be established between non-county boroughs and quarter sessions. There was to be no channel of communication between them, and they would be in some cases two almost hostile bodies—he meant hostile in the sense of entirely separate. If this Amendment were not accepted some means must be found of dovetailing one with the other. He was therefore glad to see that the Government had put down an Amendment with regard to representation. He thought the hon. Member opposite who had thanked the Government ought to have reserved his thanks. The Solicitor-General, it was true, hoped to meet this point on Report, but all he had on the Paper was that the Secretary of State "may" make rules. There was not even a direct instruction.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said this expression was always construed as a direction.

SIR EDWARD GREY thought it would be best to frame a direct instruction, and expressed the opinion that the only satisfactory way would be to insert words in Clause 5. He did not doubt the good faith of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but he could not help his mind going back to what was said with regard to the time limit on the Second Reading, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman thought something might be done in Committee, and how that idea was carried out.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: What I said was that the question of time limit should be considered in Committee.

SIR EDWARD GREY said that the impression created by the remarks of the right hon. and learned Gentleman on the Second Reading of the Bill was that it would not only be considered, but considered with a view of admitting it into the Bill, but that there were difficulties in the way. The Bill was, however, being discussed under certain restrictions which might cause those difficulties to be disposed of somewhat summarily on Report.

MR LLOYD WHARTON thought the Opposition were showing a certain lack of gratitude inasmuch as representatives were to be introduced from boroughs which had never been represented before.

* MR. HIGHAM (Yorkshire, W.R., Sowerby) pointed out that hon. Members who opposed this Amendment were, to some extent, defeating their own purpose. It was contended that the Amendment would take out of the county area such an amount of value as would deprive the county of a large amount of its worth. But in non-county boroughs at the present time there was an exceedingly strong feeling against the deprivation to which they were subjected, and the feeling was so operating as to cause the non-county boroughs to force themselves into the position of county boroughs. In Accrington, one of the largest non-county boroughs in Lancashire, there was a very strong feeling that this work should be left to them. For years they had felt that the appeals to quarter sessions were really against them, and if the larger non-county boroughs were left out of the Bill the present feeling would be intensified. Under the proposal of the Government the boroughs of Nelson, with a population of 35,000, Accrington with a population of 45,000, and Darwen with a population of 40,000, would be in the position of children, and he appealed to the Government to consider the position of such non-county boroughs. It would be an easy matter for these non-county boroughs to add surrounding districts to their area, and the counties would then be deprived of a greater amount of value still. In the towns which he had mentioned much of the opposition to the Bill arose from the fact that they were being excluded from its action, and the opposition even of extreme temperance men would be greatly lessened by such a concession as that embodied in the Amendment.

*LIEUTENANT-COLONEL PRYCE-JONES (Montgomery Boroughs) drew attention to the fact that quarter sessions were represented by a large number of magistrates, many of whom did not reside in the district, whereas in the case of borough magistrates they did usually reside in the district. That fact, he thought, was a very strong argument why they should have a voice upon the committee appointed by the quarter sessions to consider licensing appeals. He had the honour to represent six boroughs, four of which had separate commissions of the peace. He made a strong appeal to the Government to include these boroughs. He did not see why all of them should not be represented, and he would support any proposal which would have that result.

MR. TREVELYAN said he felt bound to move an Amendment to this Amendment. He was not at all satisfied with what the Government had said in regard to non-county boroughs. Many of the smaller non-county boroughs were as important as those having 25,000 of population, and on their behalf he would move to substitute 10,000 for 25,000 in the Amendment. There were many boroughs in Yorkshire under the limit of the Amendment, which were as much deserving of consideration as those large non-county boroughs which had been mentioned. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"To leave out the words 'twenty-five' and insert the word 'ten.'"—(Mr. Trevelyan).

Question proposed, "That the words 'twenty-five' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract), as representing one of the smallest county boroughs in the West Riding of Yorkshire, supported the Amendment. Non-county boroughs which had had a separate commission of the peace for many years felt they were being badly treated in the Bill. In the borough of Pontefract the magistrates had protested most strongly against the proposal of the Government to merge these smaller boroughs into the counties. He recognised the difficulty which would be placed upon the Government if this Amendment were accepted, because, if they made the area too small, in a great many cases the fund for compensation would be too small to be of much use. There were some small non-county boroughs, such as Newmarket, which were in two counties. What would be done with them? Would they be given two representatives, or none at all? He thought the simple way would be to allow every one of these small boroughs to manage its own affairs. They would have ample funds at their disposal in most cases to deal with any reasonable reduction of licences. He hoped the Government would recognise the claim of these old non-county boroughs and give them fair and just consideration under the Bill.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.) said he desired to support the Amendment moved by his hon. friend behind him on the ground that 25,000 was too high. The hon. Member for Ripon seemed to think that there were a very small number of boroughs under 25,000 with separate commissions of the peace. That might be so in the North of England but was not the case in the West of England. In the large county of Somerset there was not one single borough which would be included by this 25,000 limit. It seemed ridiculous that a borough which had the right to send a Member to Parliament should have no right of representation under this clause. He was sure the Home Secretary would recognise that there was a very strong feeling indeed in small non-county boroughs not only with a population of 25,000 but of 10,000 and under, that they did not like to be treated in this way. What would happen under this Bill was that the autonomy of the small non-county boroughs would be destroyed. He supported the area being 10,000 under the Education Act, and therefore he was absolutely consistent in this matter. As regarded the licensing question, it was only fair and right that there should be local self-government in the fullest sense. He certainly hoped his hon. friend would press this Amendment to a division, and he could assure the Committee that as regarded the West of England there was a strong feeling that the 25,000 limit was not of the slightest advantage to them.

MR. WORSLEY-TAYLOR hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment. He was one of those who habitually sat at quarter sessions, and he ventured to think that if this Amendment were accepted it would go far to create very great difficulty in the administration of the Act. In the county of Lancashire there was a population of 4,300,000, and of that number 2,500,000 were in county boroughs, leaving 1,800,000 for the rest of the administrative county. So far as he could see from the census, there were no less than fourteen of these non-county boroughs, having separate sessions which had populations of 25,000 and over. The total population of these fourteen non-county boroughs with over 25,000 inhabitants was about 480,000. Therefore the result was that there would be taken out of the administrative county for the purpose of the compensation fund that figure of 480,000, leaving 1,300,000 instead of 1,800,000, and there would be in that county fourteen different sets of authorities for the purpose of the compensation fund. He thought as a matter of economical administration that it would be vastly better for the 1,800,000 and for the purposes of raising the compensation fund that they should be dealt with generally.

*MR. EMMOTT (Oldham) appealed to the hon. Member for Elland to withdraw his Amendment, because it seemed to him to bring the whole question to a ridiculous point, and he was perfectly certain that there was not a ghost of a chance of it being carried. With regard to the other Amendment dealing with areas having a separate commission of the peace and 25,000 inhabitants, he thought a very strong case could be made out for it. He had not been convinced by the figures of the hon. Member opposite. If these boroughs were taken out of the county, the county only lost money; but the boroughs lost much more than money by being retained. Many of them were not ejusdem generis with the county around them. These boroughs hated the interference of quarter sessions because they were often a different class of population altogether, and they felt that the county justices did not understand the requirements of their localities. It was admitted that in some cases they lost financially, whilst in others they gained. He thought a very strong case had been made out for the Amendment inserting 25,000, and he hoped the hon. Member for Elland would withdraw his proposal in regard to boroughs of 10,000.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said the argument of the last speaker showed exactly the same distrust of quarter sessions. These boroughs had their ancient institutions and a history older than that of quarter sessions, and consequently they did not like being interfered with by an outside body. Now the privilege they had enjoyed so long was going to be taken away from them and placed in the hands of quarter sessions. What they wanted was that all communities should work together. If they made one community jealous of another they would cause great trouble and difficulty in the working of this Bill, and he did not see how it could be avoided. If they took away certain powers from small boroughs and handed them over to quarter sessions how could they expect the local magistrates to work cordially with quarter sessions. Nothing was more likely to irritate or hurt their feelings than to have their powers taken away and handed over to quarter sessions. There might be a possibility of the fund being rather small, but they might give them the option of being included in the quarter sessions area if they wished it. That would prevent all friction and it would make this part of the Bill work smoothly. He hoped the Government would refrain from imposing these irritating restrictions upon small communities.

MR. PYM (Bedford) thought they ought to feel grateful to the Government for the concessions they had made on this point. When he came to consult his borough sessions and borough magistrates he could not say whether they would be satisfied or not. At any rate they had advanced in the direction of giving these smaller areas a certain independence which under the Bill as it stood before they did not have. He thought the suggestion to insert 10,000 might be objected to on the ground that boroughs of 10,000 would not have a sufficient number of magistrates to be able to divide them to sit in two Courts. He doubted whether the small boroughs would be sufficiently large to raise an adequate compensation fund for the purpose of reducing the number of licences. On the other hand, he thought 25,000 was sufficiently large for the purposes he had mentioned, and he hoped the Government would favourably consider this suggestion, because this was a matter upon which boroughs of 25,000 inhabitants felt very strongly. Hon. Members knew perfectly well the strong feeling of jealousy which existed in some of these old boroughs, and nothing had brought the feeling out more strongly than the creation of the county councils. The interference of the county council with his borough would be like holding out a red rag to a bull. Why should they do this? If these old boroughs had a sufficiently large area and sufficient magistrates to carry out the intention of the Bill, why should they not be given this independent power? He hoped the Government would give a favourable consideration to this point. On this matter he desired to support the true interests of the borough he represented.

MR. WALLACE (Perth) said he would be disposed to support the Amendment of his hon. friend if he thought there was any chance of its being adopted, but in the circumstances he hoped it would not be pressed, because he thought if it was pressed it would not be carried, while it would endanger the acceptance of an Amendment with regard to the larger boroughs which was desired by both sides of the House. He agreed with his hon. friend as to the strong feeling in the small boroughs with regard to the preservation of their rights. In Scotland there was nothing more prized than the powers possessed by local magistrates to deal with licensing matters. The local magistrates discharged their duties in a way which gave almost universal satisfaction. He thought the same result would take place in England. None of the difficulties which might arise in the smaller boroughs could arise in the larger boroughs of over 25,000 inhabitants. He was quite sure that it would create great jealousy amongst the smaller boroughs if they discriminated between them, giving representation on quarter sessions to some and denying it to others. He hoped that, in carrying out the pledge given, the hon. and learned Member would try to see that all these boroughs had the same representation on the licensing authority.

VISCOUNT MORPETH (Birmingham, S.) said hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House seemed to have forgotten the nature of the Bill with which they were dealing. It was a Bill for the encouragement of temperance. Hon. Members on the other side of the House laughed. They had been advocating temperance, and had continually said that the proper way of dealing with this subject was to have a national levy over the whole country for the purposes of compensation, and now they were busily engaged helping the smaller boroughs to limit the very small and inadequate fund to be provided for the purposes of this Bill. The Committee had been told by hon. Members opposite about the prestige of the borough magistrates. They had been told that certain things must not be done because of the interference with the dignity and prestige of the borough magistrates. He did not admit that there was such a feeling as hon. Members had alluded to; but assuming that there was this feeling, it seemed to him that the best way to get over it was to adopt the Amendment proposed by his right hon. friend the Home Secretary. He looked at this matter purely from the point of view of how they were going to help in the reduction of licences. He held that they would help in the reduction of licences by making the areas of adequate size. The congestion was not the same all over the country. It was worse in some districts than in others, and if they were to reduce the number of licences in the most congested districts it was desirable that those areas should be joined to other districts, which would help them out in the matter of reductions. He hoped the Government would stand firm in this matter and not allow the areas they had selected to be whittled away and the effectiveness of the Bill to be in that way lessened.

*SIR JOSEPH LEESE (Lancashire, Accrington) said he could conceive why hon. Members in discussing this question put forward the views which suited their own constituents. He did not quarrel with them for that, but when they brought forward an Amendment to the Amendment on the Paper, which would destroy the possibility of doing a fair measure of justice to the larger boroughs, he thought that policy ought to be deprecated. He regarded the Amendment to the Amendment as absolutely antagonistic to the proposal of his hon. friend the Member for Lancaster. In effect the 10,000 population boroughs said to the larger boroughs: "You shall not have autonomy unless we get it too." The result of giving effect to that view would be that the large boroughs, in which he was specially interested, and those large places which were within 3,000 or 4,000 of being county boroughs, would be kept out of their legitimate rights. He thought the Committee did not know the amount of jealousy that existed between the large non-county boroughs and the county councils. The non-county boroughs found themselves being deprived of their local autonomy step by step. They conceived that they could manage their own affairs as well as the county councils could manage for them. They were indignant at being superseded as educational authorities in their own boroughs, and now they were not to be permitted to control the drink trade in their local districts. He would heartily support the proposal of the hon. Member for Lancaster.

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe) said he happened to be in intimate touch with three boroughs which would be closely affected by the Amendment, if carried. He was a member of the Bench of the borough of Accrington, and he knew the feeling there against the proposals in this Bill. The other boroughs of which he spoke were Darwen and Clitheroe. The whole of these boroughs had sent to him officially, through the town councils and the borough Benches, petitions and resolutions protesting against this proposal. Surely that was the only way, apart from a general election, they hay of obtaining the opinion of the people directly concerned. Here they had opinion directly stated against the action of the Government in this matter. He agreed with the hon Member for Sowerby that to deprive local authorities of the powers which they previously had would do serious injury to the good government of our municipalities. The noble Lord the Member for Birmingham came and told them that this was an unwise proposal. He had better go to the Birmingham Borough Bench and ask them to give up their rights. It was most unfair for hon. Members representing places which had this power to try to prevent others from getting it. He hoped the Government would gracefully consent to the Amendment.

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent) supported the Amendment. He was perfectly certain that the Solicitor-General fully recognised the difficulties underlying this question. He thought the non-county boroughs had a grievance in this respect. He represented three large towns in the Potteries, and the question was peculiarly complicated in relation to them. One town happened to be a county borough, having a population of over 50,000. Naturally the others were jealous of that town. He sympathised with Gentlemen representing the smaller boroughs, but to suggest that boroughs of 10,000 population should be included was going too far in the other direction, unless large boroughs of over 25,000 population were placed in the same position as county boroughs. If these were county boroughs the question would be perfectly simple, but as they were not, it was extremely hard that boroughs with a population of 30,000 or 40,000 should be placed in a distinctly inferior position to that of towns immediately adjoining whose population was just over 50,000. He hoped the Solicitor-General would see his way to going a little further than he had done towards meeting the very strong views which were held on both sides of the House.

MR. GEORGE WHITELEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Pudsey) said he had always objected to this grading of boroughs according to population, for, after all, that was a fluctuating standard. They all remembered that when the Local Government Act was passed two classes of boroughs were established — county boroughs with a population of 50,000, and non-county boroughs with a population of less than 50,000. Great soreness was created in the smaller boroughs on account of this distinction, because they were deprived of some of their privileges and placed under the rule of the county councils. The Government were proposing to do exactly the same injustice to the smaller boroughs under this Bill as under the Local Government Act. Now it was proposed to have boroughs under 25,000 population, boroughs between 25,000 and 50,000 population, and county boroughs a class by themselves. It would be better to deal with all the boroughs in the same fashion and give them similar privileges. By the Bill they were going to make confusion worse confounded in local government if this Amendment was not accepted by the Solicitor-General.

MR. HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle) said he wanted to join the hon. Member who had just spoken in support of the Amendment. He could not speak as the representative of a non-county borough; but he had the honour in the present year to be the chief magistrate of a non-county borough with a population of some 45,000. He presided at the annual licensing meeting, when it was unanimously decided to take no action during the present year, having regard to prospective legislation. The other day he called a meeting of the magistrates in order that they might consider the Bill that was proposing this prospective legislation, and, with one exception, they voted in support of a resolution protesting against the destruction of their powers by this Bill, and, therefore, in their name he made an appeal to the Solicitor-General that he would consider the claim of a borough of the size and importance of Darlington, with which he was connected. There was another point which ought to be very carefully kept in mind during the present discussion. The basis of this Bill had been very clearly stated to be the action of the magistrates throughout the country in taking away licences on the ground of non-requirement. Hon. Members would remember that he asked the Home Secretary to give him a Return on this particular matter, and that Return clearly demonstrated that the non-county borough Benches had committed no evil, if any evil had been committed by any Benches. If they had done the least mischief the Government ought to have some regard for the very mild way in which they had exercised their powers in the past, and should not seek by this Bill to take away those powers that they had so mildly put into operation. He appealed to the Solicitor-General whether he could not see his way to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Lancaster and allow non-county boroughs of a population of over 25,000 to retain the powers which they had hitherto enjoyed.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said he was most anxious, if he could, to go further than he had already done. But the Government had gone into this question most minutely, and they had deliberately come to the conclusion that this Amendment would spoil the working of the compensation fund. It was, therefore, impossible that he could hold out any hope of going further than he had already done. He had himself gone personally into the figures of all the non-county boroughs—certainly most of those which had more than 25,000 of population, and had a separate commission of the peace—and the conclusion to which he had come was that in some cases there would not be sufficient contributions to the compensation fund to enable the magistrates practically and effectively to deal with the suppression of unnecessary licensed houses. On the other hand, in several boroughs there would be this state of facts—particularly in comparatively new districts where there was a large population—that there would be a very good class of public-house, and practically there would be very little necessity for taking away superabundant houses at all; but, at the same time, there would be a very considerable annual value of contributions to the compensation fund lost to the county, which wanted it badly in connection with some of the small non-county boroughs whose contributions would be very small. It was solely on these grounds that the Government had drawn the line they had done. But they thought they ought to do something for the larger non-county boroughs, and he had undertaken to consider, as far as possible, to have a representation of the non-county boroughs upon quarter sessions; and that he would attempt to carry out to the best of his ability. It had been said over and over again that they were taking away some right from the non-county boroughs. He knew that they were taking it away to this extent, that they would have only the same power to suggest the houses that ought to be suppressed as they now had.

Mr. WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley): They do not suggest now. They have the power.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said that the hon. Member knew perfectly well the distinction. At the present moment they had not the absolute right of taking away a licence, because there was an appeal to quarter sessions which was exercised in every case.

Mr. WHITTAKER: No; not in half.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said that if the hon. Member would look into the figures he would see that in almost every case, if a licence was taken away for the reason of redundancy, and redundancy alone, there was an appeal to the quarter sessions. Under the Bill the local justices would simply report the house to quarter sessions. But if in any wise the compensation fund was made less adequate than under the Bill, then they would be really interfering more with the power to reduce licensed houses. Therefore, the Government could not accept the Amendment.

*Mr. HELME asked if he might venture just finally to suggest to the Government that in the list of the boroughs presented to them a comparison was made of the amount the compensation fund would amount to calculated for areas in the smaller counties and the smaller county boroughs, and those asked for were sufficiently large. Hence there was no question of principle, as opposed to the Bill, in pressing this Amendment on the Committee. He asked the Government to look at the question as related to such boroughs in Lancashire as were on the edge of becoming county boroughs—such as Blackpool and Southport. These boroughs had very large areas, and at the present moment they were applying to be constituted county boroughs. In fact, they would be county boroughs before this Bill came into operation. Contrast Canterbury, with a population of 15,000, which was a county borough, with Lancaster, the county town, with a population of between 40,000 and 50,000 and with old historic associations for hundreds of years. Why should Lancaster be placed in a position of inferiority to Canterbury? Where was the justice in that, and where was the principle? This was not a Party question. It was undeniable that in the request they had made they were guided by the fact that they knew that the Government had the power to carry the Bill through the House, and they only asked the Government to consider the equities of the case. The fact was they restricted their request to those boroughs which were large enough to provide the compensation. In the interest of the future working of this measure, he would point out that it would be far better if the Home Secretary and Solicitor-General would, before the Report stage, look into this question and bring up a clause which would work better than the one proposed. It might be possible to provide that in some very small boroughs there should be an appeal to quarter sessions. He trusted that in these circumstances the hon. Member for Elland would withdraw his Amendment.

*Mr. SLACK (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) moved to insert a provision enabling any person entitled to be heard by the committee of quarter sessions to appear and be heard by counsel or solicitor. He submitted that such a provision was necessary in view of the complicated terms of the present measure and the difficulties of interpreting the licensing law of this country. Solicitors as well as counsel were included in the Amendment not only in order to minimise the expense, but also because solicitors had no right of audience at quarter sessions, and might therefore be held to have no right of audience before a committee of quarter sessions. Solicitors were now heard at brewster sessions and many of the powers of brewster sessions now in reality or in effect passed to the committees referred to in this section. It was essential that those members of the local public who desired to be heard in opposition to, or in support of, a licence-application as well as an aggrieved licence-holder should unmistakably have the right to legal assistance and the services of a trained advocate before these committees.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 32, after the word 'Act,' to insert the words 'and any person entitled to be heard by such committee may appear and be heard by counsel or solicitor on his behalf.'"—(Mr. Slack).

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*Sir ALBERT ROLLIT said he hoped the Government would see their way to accept this proposal. The Amendment was not designed to give solicitors a right of audience at quarter sessions, that matter rested entirely with quarter sessions themselves, and in certain cases the right was given. The right of audience was almost universally given to solicitors before the present licensing committees, but as that committee was to be abolished and its place taken by a delegated committee of quarter sessions a question might arise as to whether solicitors would have right of audience before it. It was desirable that the question should be determined not only in the professional interest but also in the interest of the public, because many cases which would come before the new committee would not bear the expense of appearance by counsel, and in such cases unless the parties were able to do justice to themselves they would really have no representation at all.

Mr. H. D. GREENE (Shrewsbury) hoped the Amendment would not be accepted. For centuries past it had been the duty of quarter sessions to regulate the right of audience, and they had established the practice all over the country that where a sufficient representation of barristers could not be found they would hear solicitors. But it ought to be left to the quarter sessions to decide to whom they would give audience. There was no jealousy on the part of the Bar in the matter. The Bar was not so numerous a body as the solicitors; it was more under effective control; barristers had adopted certain sessions throughout the country, and it was easier for quarter sessions to recognise those who were continually appearing before them than solicitors who might come from all parts of the country, and who as strangers might not altogether command the confidence of the Court. The matter was an important one as it involved the giving to solicitors of a statutory right to appear. No such right was given in regard to the standing committees created in 1872, and he failed to see why such a right should be conferred by statute in connection with the new committee to be set up by this Bill. No public interest would be served by the Amendment, and he hoped it would be rejected.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Essex, Saffron Walden) said that inasmuch as solicitors were allowed to appear at the ordinary brewster sessions he could not understand why persons interested should not be permitted to be represented by solicitors before the committee of quarter sessions.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) was altogether opposed to the giving of any new statutory rights to solicitors. The last statutory right given to that profession involved an expenditure of £2,000 per annum from the public funds to enable solicitors to strike one another off the Rolls, but the duty had not been adequately performed, there being many solicitors who ought to have been so dealt with, but had not been. If a statutory right was to be given it should be reserved to barristers, though, personally, he would rather have neither barristers nor solicitors. In cases of the sort to be dealt with under this clause, an ordinary citizen could adequately represent his case before a body of intelligent country justices. He did not agree that the ordinary layman would be unable to do justice to his case. He would readily back an ordinary intelligent publican against an ordinary intelligent solicitor in such a matter. But the Court of quarter sessions would have power to hear either counsel or solicitors, and the choice ought to be left to the Court.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) reminded the Committee that barristers could not be briefed except through solicitors. The heavy cost of litigation in this country was caused by the necessity imposed upon suitors of having two legal advisers belonging to the different branches of the profession.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the remedy was to abolish the solicitor.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said if the hon. Member would propose it perhaps there would be no objection raised by the other branch of the profession.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: Would you give them compensation ?

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said that what were practically the duties of brewster sessions were to be transferred to a new body and all that was asked for by the mover of this Amendment, who represented the Law Society, was that solicitors should have the same right of audience before the standing committee as they had before the other body.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said this Amendment raised questions of importance not connected with this Bill at all, and the Licensing Bill was hardly the measure upon which they could settle them. This Bill did not alter the position of barristers or solicitors in their relation to quarter sessions, and proposed to leave it exactly as it was before. The hon. and learned Member for Islington said that solicitors had already the right to appear before brewster sessions and the licensing committee. That right was not going to be affected by this Bill. As regarded the licensing committee of quarter sessions, it had always rested with quarter sessions as to whether they would hear either barristers or solicitors or whether they would allow a solicitor to appear without a barrister. They were not going to interfere with that arrangement and were leaving that power with the quarter sessions, and it would remain exactly the same after this Bill had passed as it was before. To make a change, giving audience where the quarter sessions had before had the right to refuse audience, raised a question which he did not think ought to be settled in this way, because it raised much larger questions of principle..

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said this question did not matter to the solicitor at all, and it was not a question of wrangling between him and the barrister as to who should get the fees. The solicitor made a much better thing out of it when he instructed counsel than when he appeared himself. All they did by compelling them to select a barrister was to double the cost to the public. The Solicitor-General was a living example of what solicitors suffered from and the Attorney-General was another. The result of this system was that the barrister got all the fees and the solicitors got nothing but the work. This was not fair trade and he wanted a little reform in this respect. This was the only country in the world where they had a system of this sort. They certainly ought to abolish either the solicitor or the barrister. There were one or two other professions he should like to see abolished, and they might include the parsons, but that was rather wide of the subject. He wished to allow the client to choose for himself. In most districts the solicitors had a much wider experience in advocacy than barristers on this question, and why should they be prevented from presenting the same case before quarter sessions? It would save expense, and in many cases it would be more efficiently done. This would not be in the interests of solicitors because they would get smaller fees, but it would be in the interests of the public.

*MR. THEODORE TAYLOR said he did not advocate this proposal so much in the interests of solicitors as of the public. It would be presumptuous of him as a mere layman to express any opinion as between the respective branches of the legal profession, but he wished to retain the right of a client to have a solicitor to do the work he had done so long before the local bench. The Solicitor-General had stated that this Amendment was opening up by a side issue a great question, and he said he objected to take up such a large subject upon so small a point. The fact of the matter was they only wanted that the same business should be allowed to go into the hands of solicitors as had been given to them before. It was the Government who were making a little change in the procedure in this particular business, and they simply wished a client to continue to be able to have a solicitor instead of a barrister if he wished it. They did not wish generally to infringe the great professional principle which was at stake, and as a layman he was not going to express any opinion as to whether a solicitor or a barrister would be the better to employ. This Amendment was in the interests of the public, and he claimed for the public the same option, which they had had hitherto, to engage for this particular business those whom they had engaged before. Surely they could do this without raising the great issue which had been referred to by the Solicitor-General.

*MR. SLACK said he had not raised this question in the interests of the legal profession but solely in the interests of the general public. It seemed to him that the licensing law was in about as complicated a tangle as any branch of the law, and he thought that anyone interested in objecting to or in the renewal or refusal of a licence ought to have the opportunity of employing someone conversant with the law to appear on his or their behalf before the committee of quarter sessions. The section as framed did not give a right of audience to any person whatever, and the committee of quarter sessions might possibly hold that they had no power to hear anyone unless some such words as he had proposed were placed after the word "Act." Furthermore, an aggrieved licence-holder or a body of persons anxious to object to the renewal of a licence ought to have the right to retain the services of an advocate without being, in all cases, put to the additional expense which the retaining of a barrister as well as a solicitor would involve.

MR. DISRAELI (Cheshire, Altrincham) moved an Amendment to omit the words which would have the effect of abolishing the old licensing committee. He said he had no hostile intention in moving this Amendment. His object was to obtain from those responsible for the measure the reasons why the old county licensing committee had been abolished. That committee was an integral part of a public body, and it had rights and duties which worked into this Bill in a most satisfactory manner. He could not understand why the committee was to be done away with at the moment when another committee was to be appointed. He was conservative enough not to see an old body like the county licensing committee abolished without dropping a tear. He thought that it might have been utilised in working this Act instead of constituting an entirely new body.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 32, to leave out from the word 'and' to the end of Sub-section (2)."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Sir EDWARD CARSON said that the new committee would be the licensing committee of the quarter sessions, appointed by the same persons as the old committee was, but with certain restrictions as to the numbers.

Mr. DISRAELI withdrew his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

"In page 3, line 33, at end, to add the words '(3) The justices of a licensing district being a county borough shall exercise their powers under the Licensing Acts, 1828 to 1902, as to the renewal of licences through the borough licensing committee appointed under Section 38 of The Licensing Act, 1872, but such number as the whole body of justices acting in and for the borough determine shall be substituted for seven as the maximum number of that committee.'"—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*Sir JAMES WOODHOUSE said he wished to move an Amendment to the Home Secretary's Amendment providing that such "greater" number of the licensing borough committee should be substituted for seven as the maximum number of the committee. The Amendment of the Government, whilst enabling the justices to increase the number of the committee, would also enable them to diminish it, and to appoint a committee of five instead of seven. He was anxious to make it clear that the intention of the Government was to make the number in excess of seven.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"In line 4, after the word 'such' to insert the word 'greater.'"—(Sir James Woodhouse.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'greater' be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that the justices would themselves decide what the number of the committee should be; but perhaps the hon. Member's idea was to make a minimum of seven, with power to increase the maximum. He would consider that point before Report.

*Sir JAMES WOODHOUSE said that on the understanding that the minimum would be seven, with power to increase the maximum, he would withdraw his Amendment.

*Sir JAMES WOODHOUSE said that his next Amendment provided that the whole body of justices should be "qualified."

Amendment proposed—

"In line 4, after the second word 'of' to insert the word 'qualified.'"—(Sir James Woodhouse.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'qualified' be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

Sir EDWARD CARSON said it had already been decided that men who were not qualified could not vote for the appointment of a committee. The Amendment of the Home Secretary had to be read in connection with previous Licensing Acts, and by inserting the word here it would throw doubts on the provisions of the other Acts where the same provision did not exist.

SIR ROBERT REID said he could not help thinking that this was a very important committee, and that it would be more prudent to make provision in the Act, so as to prevent any doubt or misgiving, that those who were on the committee were subject to some disqualification.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said he really did not think any difficulty would arise in ascertaining what was disqualification.

MR. WHITTAKER said he was glad to hear that disqualification did apply, and he hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be prepared to put words in to make it clear that the disqualification applied to the whole Bill.

MR. WHITLEY said he would make a special appeal to the Solicitor-General that the disqualification should be re-enacted in this Bill. He had had considerable experience of licensing committees, and he knew that it was exceedingly inconvenient to refer to several statutes in order to arrive at a point. It should be remembered that justices who were not qualified did take part in proceedings "at their own risk," and it was invidious for a private individual to challenge the vote of such justices. The real position could be understood better if some provision as to disqualification were put into this Bill, so as to prevent a continued reference to previous Acts.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said he must point out that this Act must be construed as one of the Licensing Acts from 1828 to 1902. It might be said why re-enact one section and not another. However, he would be willing to insert words to make the point clear.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE said that as the reply of the Solicitor-General was sympathetic, he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) said that as regarded the first part of his Amendment there was now no necessity to move it because of the assurance of the Solicitor-General. A new situation would be created by the Act, and justices would have a different type of cases to decide. Financial considerations would enter into questions, as they had not entered before, in connection with the payment of compensation, and it was essential that the actions of justices should be above suspicion. On that broad ground he would move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 33, at end, to add the words, 'No justice disqualified under the Licensing Acts, and no owner, lessee, or occupier of any licensed premises within any county, and no agent of such person acting, or who during the two years preceding shall have acted for him in any wise in connection with such licensed premises shall be qualified to act as a justice within such county for any of the purposes of this Act.'"—(Mr. Herbert Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that the Government could not possibly accept the Amendment. It would include in disqualification holders of shares in brewery companies, which was going a long way to find a personal interest. It would also debar any person who in anywise had acted as agent for and owner within two years, and that was going an enormous length. Surely the present law was stringent enough. The hon. Member suggested that a licence-holder in "any county" should be disqualified.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS said he meant "the" county.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that even with that limitation he thought the present law was stringent enough.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CRIPPS (Lancashire, Stretford) said at present, when there was an appeal to quarter sessions, the licensing magistrates, who dealt with the matter in the first instance, did not take part in a decision when the matter was under appeal. That was in accordance with a general principle of law, and should be followed in the altered procedure under the Bill to ensure an impartial tribunal. He used the words "decision of the committee," because in the view of those cognisant with quarter sessions procedure the presence of the justices might be useful to assist the tribunal.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 33, at end, to add the words—'(3) No justice who has taken part in any decision of quarter sessions shall, if on the committee, take part in any decision of the committee when the grant or renewal of such licence is under consideration.'"—(Mr. Cripps.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Sir EDWARD CARSON said from a practical point of view it would be impossible to accept this Amendment. Reports would be received from all the licensing districts in the county, and, as, each part of the county would have to be considered in relation to the whole, the Amendment would mean that every man would have to be taken off when the report had to be decided upon.

Mr. CRIPPS said after what his right hon. and learned friend had said he would not press the Amendment. He would merely like to say that what the Solicitor-General suggested would not arise. The law as it now existed did not allow a magistrate to sit in appeal on a case, which he had already decided, when it came to quarter sessions. He hoped that practice would be followed in the future as it had been in the past in order to ensure the maximum of impartiality.

Mr. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey) said he did not know whether the Solicitor-General would see his way to accept the Amendment he now proposed to move on behalf of his hon. friend the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs to put in the words "or a non-county borough having a separate commission of the peace." But a moment's considation would show that a non-county borough having a separate commission of the peace ought to be represented at quarter sessions in some way or other. It was quite clear that this Amendment was directed to a defect in the Bill and offered a remedy for it if such a remedy was possible.

"In page 3, line 29, after the words last inserted, to insert the words 'or a non-county borough having a separate commission of the peace."—(Mr. Ellis Griffith.)

Sir EDWARD CARSON said that when the question was first raised he had promised to put down an Amendment for the Report stage of the Bill. That promise he adhered to, but he could not say what the nature of his Amendment would be until he looked into the matter.

Sir EDWARD GREY admitted that the Solicitor-General had met them very fairly. He had promised to consider the matter between this and the Report stage, but he stated that he reserved his opinion now because of the difficulties of detail. The right hon. and learned Gentleman must not be surprised, however, if the Committee were a little disappointed in this matter, because it was quite possible that on the Report stage they might not have an opportunity of considering how far the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment fell short of their hopes. In view of the conditions under which the Report stage would be conducted it was necessary that hon. Members should express their views on the present occasion, in order that the Solicitor-General, who was anxious to meet them as far as possible, might be perfectly informed as to what the desires of the Committee were.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said he was particularly anxious that all these boroughs should be represented. There were so few of them that it would not be a serious matter to give each a representative. The Solicitor-General had agreed to insert words giving a statutory right of representation; would he not go a step further and say that such a right would be given to each of these boroughs?

Sir EDWARD CARSON said he could not go further than he had already intimated.

Clause 6:—

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE, in moving to make the power of the Secretary of State to make rules "subject to the consent of Parliament," said that on the present occasion it was impossible to do more than discuss the general character of the regulations. The practice of devolving upon Government Departments important branches of legislation had made considerable progress under the present Government, and it was time the matter was seriously considered. The practice was, no doubt, largely due to Parliamentary exigencies. Governments had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to carry measures if Parliament was to be allowed to discuss, even within moderate limits, the proposals put forward; hence resort was had to all kinds of devices to withdraw from the cognisance of Parliament large portions of legislative proposals. The functions which under this clause were to be devolved upon the Home Secretary were such that Parliament fifteen years ago would not have dreamt of delegating to a Government Department. They practically comprised a Bill in themselves, and he desired to enter a general protest against this extension of the doctrine of legislation by Departments. Possibly it would be better that a Committee of the House should be appointed to draw up the regulations in conjunction with the Department; at any rate the House ought to retain some control over purely legislative matters of this character. He understood that the rules were not even to be laid upon the Table of the House. That was an entirely new departure. The requirement did not afford a very great safeguard, because an opportunity was very seldom given for the discussion of rules so laid, but the mere knowledge that Parliament had the power and might if necessary insist upon exercising it, was, at any rate, some safeguard against this kind of legislation. Parliament had tried devolution upon Grand and Select Committees, it was now trying devolution upon Government Departments, which was the worst of all possible kinds of devolution. The time had come when the House of Commons ought seriously to consider whether a stop should not be put to this encroachment upon its rights. The guillotine was bad enough, but this proposal was worse, and he submitted that some provision ought to be inserted reserving to the House of Commons the right to express its judgment upon the rules made under the clause. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.) said that this clause was a good specimen of a species of draftsmanship which was becoming increasingly common, the object of which was to exclude from the consideration of the House matters which in old days were always recorded in the body of the Act itself or in the schedules. In the Municipal Corporations Act, for example, they would find the very same class of matters dealt with in the schedules, the details of which were subject to the criticism and received the approval of the House; and it was in order that the time of Parliament, or, what was more important, he supposed, that the time of the Government might be saved that this particular method of draftsmanship was employed. But it had never been carried quite to the same extent to which it had been carried in this clause. He was not going to discuss in detail the different sub-heads, but he wished to allude to the first sub-head, which provided that—

"A Secretary of State may make rules for carrying into effect this Act, and may by those rules, amongst other things—(a) provide for the provisional renewal of licences which are included in reports of the justices of a licensing district under this Act, and for consultation with those justices as to their reports, and the time and manner of the consideration of those reports, and of the payment of compensation."

That was a pretty large jurisdiction for a Minister of the Crown. The other sub-heads were—

"(b) provide for the enforcement of any security given for money borrowed, and for the time within which money borrowed is to be replaced; and (c) regulate the management and application of the compensation fund and the audit of the accounts of quarter sessions; and (d) provide for the mode of appointment, number, quorum, and procedure of committees, and for the employment of officers for the purposes of this Act; and (e) regulate the procedure for obtaining the consent of quarter sessions to the grant of a new on-licence, and for the hearing under this Act of persons interested in licensed premises; and (f) provide for the authentication of any documents on behalf of quarter sessions or their committees."

The whole of this new machinery would be subjected to the control of the Home Secretary, and Parliament was to have no control at all in the matter. He quite agreed that in Home Office administration it was necessary to give the Minister the power of framing special rules and regulations, but they had always required such special rules and regulations to be laid on the Table in order that they might receive the approval or disapproval of the House. There was no such provision in this clause and he would like to ask the Solicitor-General on what occasion and under what conditions the House of Commons would have the opportunity of bringing the Minister to book. If the House was not to have an opportunity by the laying of the rules and regulations on the Table he could not see any other way by which any rules and regulations which might be made could be brought under the control of the House. It was quite conceivable that some day or other they might have a Liberal Secretary of State in power, and he would have the framing of these regulations, and very drastic he might make them. Therefore, he was not making this appeal in any sense from the point of view of one Party or the other. He contended that in the interests of the authority and jurisdiction of the House of Commons they ought not to part lightly with so large a share in the framing of regulations which were essential to the proper carrying out of this Bill.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said he took even a more serious view of the clause than did either the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment or the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. They seemed to think that it would be sufficient if the regulations were laid on the Table.

Mr. ASQUITH: We think that would be a safeguard.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES thought it would be no safeguard at all. Rules and regulations of the kind were laid on the Table, and unless an address was moved within forty days they had ipso facto the force of law. However much a private Member might desire to call them in question, he had no chance whatever of doing so except in the middle of the night, and practically no attention was called to them, for the simple reason that there was no opportunity during those forty days. Therefore what the right hon. Gentleman opposite thought might be a safeguard was no safeguard at all under the present rules of the House. Therefore he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman and his friends would dismiss from their minds the idea that this Amendment would meet the case.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee) said the rules would have to receive the approval or disapproval of Parliament in the event of the Amendment being carried. The proceedings on the rules would be regarded as business exempted from the Standing Order by which business was interrupted at twelve o'clock.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman if he meant that the rules could be brought before the House for discussion after midnight. He did not believe the Speaker would hold that this was exempted business. He came now to the merits of the case. He agreed that it was a most serious thing to place this power in the hands of a Secretary of State. Consider what was to be done by the Bill. They had spent many days profitably, and some unprofitably, in limiting the powers of the licensing justices and quarter sessions. What they should and what they should not do had been argued, but Clause 6 upset the whole of the arrangements, and put the whole of the procedure of the justices, how they were to get money, and what they were to do with it, entirely under the Home Office. That was a supersession of the whole of the rest of the Bill. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had read some of the clauses. He would only refer to sub-sections (b) and (c).

The Home Office was to make regulations to—

> "(b) provide for the enforcement of any security given for money borrowed, and for the time within which money borrowed is to be replaced; and
> "(c) regulate the management and application of the compensation fund and the audit of the accounts of quarter sessions."

Why, the whole of the rest of this Bill dealt with the method in which the compensation fund was to be raised and how it was to be applied, and now it was proposed by Clause 6 to take away all the power they had previously given and to hand it over at one fell swoop to the Home Office. He agreed that that was taking away the liberties of the House, and the liberties of the people of England. It was taking away power from the cognisance of the House and putting it into Provisional Orders, or orders by the Home Office, or other Departments, with respect to matters affecting the well-being of the subject. It was for the House to settle the terms of an Act of Parliament, to determine what the conditions were to be, and how the powers should be exercised. He submitted that the House had no right to delegate that power. The House had no right to say, "We are tired of debating the Bill; we cannot go into all the details required in order to insure that it shall be properly carried out, and we will hand the whole thing over to the Secretary of State for the Home Department." Secretaries of State were not always so perfect as the right hon. Gentleman who now represented the Home Office. They might have in that office the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife, and, although his own side would feel great confidence in him, he was not sure that Members on that side would feel equal confidence in him in the administration of the Licensing Acts. That was sufficient to show the extreme danger of allowing anything to pass from the power of the House. What was here proposed amounted not to delegation, but to usurpation, of the duties of the House. If the House agreed to a clause like this it would amount to a dereliction of their duty. This supersession of the House by Ministers in the making of rules had gone far enough, and it seemed to him that unless the House now made a stand the practice would go very much further than was safe for the House or the country. Let the House remember that he was a friend of this Bill. He thought it was a good Bill, and he had supported the Government upon it all through. But with regard to this clause he did entreat them to pause and think what they were doing. He could see no reason why this clause should not be omitted altogether, and quarter sessions and the licensing justices left to make the regulations required. Surely they could be trusted for that. He had been struck during the discussion of the Bill by the extreme ability, good temper, and accessibility to argument of the Solicitor-General. The hon. and learned Gentleman had shown a most remarkable instance of the ease with which a Minister who was accessible to reason might conduct a Bill through the House. His argument regarding this clause was not founded on prejudice against the Bill, the brewer, or the publican. It was based on the interests of the House of Commons, in which he was sure both the Solicitor-General and the Prime Minister felt as much interest as he did himself. He did not know whether the whole scope and final effect of this clause had been duly considered yet. It would take a great load off his mind if it could be withdrawn.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) said he was afraid his hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn would think that his intervention in the debate showed that a less reasonable spirit was going to prevail than he found in the utterances of his hon. and learned friend the Solicitor-General. His hon. friend was alarmed at the terrible prospect of leaving matters of such immense importance to be dealt with, not by the House, but by an executive officer, the Home Secretary. But his own proposal was to leave them, not to the Home Secretary, who was responsible to the House, but to persons who did not owe any responsibility to the House. If these matters were legislative concerns which the House ought never to allow out of its grasp, what was to be thought of a proposal to turn every bench of quarter sessions in the country into a legislative assembly? Whatever might be their merits, the various parts of his hon. friend's speech did not hang together and form a single argumentative whole. He entirely dissented both from his hon. friend and from the right hon. Gentleman opposite as to the importance of the matters dealt with in this clause. He did not think they were of such importance as they supposed. They were matters purely of machinery, and he did not think it would be to the advantage of the House unnecessarily to cumber legislation with them. If there was anything which must have been brought home to every Member of the House, he would not say in the course of the present session, or of the last decade, but of the last twenty years, it was that the difficulty of getting a Bill through the House in the face of discussion, which might be of the most legitimate kind, was augmenting. It had produced some expedients to which he had himself given the sanction of his own example, but which he admitted were not of a kind to conduce to lucidity in legislation—for instance, legislation by reference. That method had been resorted to by both Parties. It was not that any Government desired to keep from the House matters which the House ought to discuss, but that any expedient by which the discussion of a Bill in the House could be shortened the Government of the day were almost bound to grasp at. Unless they did so it was really hardly possible to get through the modicum of legislation which was admitted on both sides to be necessary.

In his opinion the expedient adopted in Clause 6 was far less open to objection than the extreme cases of legislation by reference which themselves he regarded as necessary. Of course, it was possible to abuse the power of handing over to the Home Secretary or any other Minister, responsibilities which the House does not wish to take upon itself. But would anybody say that those powers were abused in the present case? The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the Factory Acts, and said with perfect truth that it was necessary in these cases in order to secure elasticity that the Home Secretary should have great power of varying provisions with regard to different trades and districts. This power was of incomparably greater importance than anything in this purely machinery clause. With regard to the question of precedents, he reminded the Committee that by Clause 41 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, passed by general consent last year, it rested in the first place with the licensing court—[Mr. McCRAE: Which is partly representative]—and then with the Secretary for Scotland, to deal with matters which were more than mere matters of machinery. He did not, however, care to rest this question on precedents, though precedents might be quoted. In a matter of machinery he thought it would be lunacy to insist that the whole machinery should be set out to be discussed and made an instrument of obstruction or a cause of long delay. Moreover, there was an inherent advantage in leaving these questions of machinery to an executive officer responsible to the House, because changes might occur, and the conditions in one district might differ from those in another. It would, of course, be possible to discuss the conduct of the executive officer in Committee of Supply.

MR. ROSE (Cambridgeshire, Newmarket) apologised for not having been in his place when his Amendment came on. The Prime Minister had said that this was purely a question of machinery, but having had considerable experience, he could say that machinery was frequently of vital importance. He firmly believed that if Parliament had the power of considering and drawing up carefully the regulations under which this measure would be worked, then it might be a step forward in temperance reform; but if the regulations were narrow and restricted, no decided progress would be made in temperance reform. Parliament should certainly have something to say in the drawing up of the regulations which would be the driving power of the machinery of the Act.

SIR JAMES JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street) said that it was perfectly clear that the Bill as it stood proposed to take away very important powers from the control of the House, and he confessed he looked upon this with considerable alarm, because he felt sure that the system would be developed in other Bills and that practically the power which now rested with the House would be taken away and given to Government Departments. He had had a good deal to do with Government Departments, and he had come to the conclusion that all the wisdom did not rest with them. If the Bill were passed as it stood, most important matters would be left in the hands of the Home Secretary.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this evening.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 6:—

Amendment again proposed—

Question proposed "That those words be there inserted."

Sir JAMES JOICEY, continuing his speech, said he simply rose to make a protest against the proposal to hand over these great powers to the Home Office. He had always been strongly in favour of the control of Parliament, but it had become the fashion to destroy the control of Parliament and place the control in the hands of the Government Departments. It was a somewhat extraordinary fact that, very often when the Prime Minister intervened, he did so just when some concession was going to be made in respect of some reasonable Amendment; and he therefore regretted that he had intervened on this occasion. Proceeding to argue in favour of the Amendment, Sir James pointed to the Scotch Act under which the licensing authority had to make the rules, which had to be confirmed by the Scotch Secretary. He thought it would be better if such a method were adopted in this Bill, for the licensing authorities were the proper persons to make the rules, but for some reason the Prime Minister was always more reasonable when dealing with Scotch legislations. If they looked at the regulations, he thought hon. Members would agree that the Bill took away from the licensing authorities a great deal of the power they ought to possess. The Home Office would practically become the licensing authority. In the Mines Regulations Act, to which the Prime Minister had referred, there was some protection to those who were affected by the rules; but in this Bill there was no such protection. This was a new departure altogether. He had the strongest objection to any such power being put in the hands of a Department, and he therefore felt it his duty to protest. He hoped the protest would have some effect and that the Solicitor-General would be able to make some concession.

Mr. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne) said he had the greatest possible objection to the Amendment. If it were carried the whole of this clause would be continuously being raised in the House. When they considered the congested state of business, that was not a state of things which anyone could look forward to with equanimity. The hon. Member for Chester-le-Street had told them the licensing committee was to be tabooed, but if this Amendment were carried it could not be anything else. He wished to see the greatest liberty possible given to licensing justices, and that seemed to be the wish of Members on both sides. He asked the House to consider what the Amendment really meant to which they were asked to consent. It meant that no rules could be made without the consent of Parliament and that every rule made would have to come before them. He did not believe the hon. Member opposite who moved the Amendment, but was not then in his place, could have given any consideration to it or he would have seen the absurdity of his suggestion. He was anxious if they were going to carry the Bill—as they were—to give the fullest power to the licensing authority, and, if hon. Members opposite were sincere in their desire to do the same thing, he might point out they would be defeating their desire by carrying the Amendment.

Mr. BROADHURST (Leicester) said that the object of this clause was to destroy all sense of independence and throw contempt upon all the local authorities. The Bill did not trust them even to decide what should be a quorum. Could anything be more absurd than that? The Committee of the House seemed to forget that there were on quarter session benches men who were as capable of administering, and as well able to decide what was just and what unjust, as most of the Members of that Committee. What could be more wanting in consideration and respect for these authorities than that the Home Office in London should make regulations, look after the application of the compensation fund, and audit the accounts of the quarter sessions? Quarter session accounts were audited now without any assistance, guidance, or help from the Home Office. Surely quarter sessions were perfectly capable of regulating the procedure of their own committees. He was amazed to find a great Department of State like the Home Office passing judgment and condemnation upon the common sense and administrative capacity of quarter sessions. The whole thing was a succession of insults to these old institutions.

Sir FREDERICK BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) on a point of order, asked if the hon. Member had read the Amendment. The Amendment was not to take away powers from the quarter sessions but to say that rules should be made by the Home Office, subject to the consent of Parliament.

Mr. BROADHURST said he would respectfully suggest that he was perfectly capable of understanding what he was talking about and was not in the least likely to be instructed or assisted by the hon. Member for Peckham. He agreed that while the Amendment would do something to retain the existing rights of ancient bodies it would have been better if it had proposed the omission of Clause 6 altogether. Nobody knew better than the Solicitor-General that the clause was unworthy of the great Department of State it concerned. It was drafted on the principle of "teaching one's grandmother to suck eggs." Brewster sessions and quarter sessions were quite as capable of dealing with the Licensing Acts as the Home Office, and if the mover of the Amendment went to a division he should certainly support him. It would at least secure some measure of protection to those bodies, since it ensured that the rules should not come into operation until they had lain on the Table of the House for at least forty days.

Mr. LLOYD WHARTON said he was entirely against the Amendment. He could not see why Parliament should be entrusted with the examination of the rules, for already its time was sufficiently taken up with other work. Up till 1888 quarter sessions had the whole of county finance to deal with. Since then the county councils had taken most of that work over. He believed that quarter sessions were still competent to deal with finance to some extent, and he suggested that certain matters in the sub-clauses should be referred to the quarter sessions, such as the borrowing of money, rules of procedure, etc. As chairman of quarter sessions he should be glad to be under the advice and sanction of the Home Office. Meanwhile he suggested that the chairmen of quarter sessions and the Home Office should meet, and having discussed the procedure to be evolved under the Act, draw up rules which would be satisfactory for the guidance of all.

Mr. GEORGE WHITE (Norfolk, N.W.) said that the object of the Amendment was somewhat misunderstood. The desire of those who supported it was that part of the rules might be left to quarter sessions, and the remainder submitted to Parliament instead of being entirely in the control of the Home Secretary. It was important to remember that the Bill had been passed through the House under very exceptional circumstances. The great powers proposed to be entrusted to the Home Secretary might be justified if the Bill had been thoroughly threshed out in Committee. Then it would have been for the House to determine what those powers should be which were to be delegated to the Home Secretary. But the Bill had been forced through the House without adequate opportunity for debate, and the House might well be jealous of the rights it conferred upon the Home Secretary. He could not agree with the Prime Minister that the rules were a mere matter of machinery. They raised many important questions of principle. By the first sub-section of the clause the Home Secretary had to keep the licence provisionally alive, pending an appeal against an adverse decision. That was a clear intimation that a licence was dead at the end of the year, and, but for the power placed in the hands of the Home Secretary, would actually expire—an argument for which the Opposition had been contending throughout. That power might, or might not, be wisely exercised by the Home Secretary, but it justified the contention of the Opposition. Some part of this sub-section was not very intelligible. It provided for the provisional renewal of licences which were included in the reports of the licensing justices, and for consultations with the justices as to their reports, and the time and manner of the consideration of those reports. Surely that did not take cognisance of the fact that brewster sessions was a Court of justice. He did not quite understand how the Home Secretary was to have consultations with the justices upon these reports. Someone must have an injustice done him by such an arrangement—either the licensee or the public — by ex parte statements made in consultation with the Home Secretary.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: The hon. Member is an error. The consultation is between the licensing justices and quarter sessions, and has nothing to do with the Home Secretary.

MR. GEORGE WHITE said the same argument applied. Those who had to arbitrate had no right to hear ex parte statements. He did not see any provisions made for the public to appear. There was very much more care taken of the interests of the trade than of the public. He asked the Government to reconsider the whole matter and allow a part of these duties to devolve upon quarter sessions, which could deal with them better than the Home Secretary, who could not know all the circumstances; and though there was a good deal to be said for placing some of these matters in the hands of the Home Secretary, others certainly ought to be subject to revision by Parliament.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he did not think the Government had shown any desire to take from quarter sessions any further powers than they thought absolutely necessary. Before making these rules, his first effort would be to secure the co-operation of the experienced representatives of quarter sessions and to ask them to assist him, probably by serving on a committee with expert officials of the Home Office, in framing these rules. That was the ordinary way in which rules were framed under any Act passed through that House. It was on the ground of uniformity that he desired to retain the rule-making power in the hands of the Secretary of State. He could assure the Committee that it was with no desire to override quarter sessions or local opinion. He would endeavour to get all the assistance possible from those who had been accustomed to carry out the duties of quarter sessions and who in future would have to carry out the provisions of this Bill.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH said the complaint of the Opposition against this clause was that it introduced a vicious principle into the legislation of the country. He was surprised that the hon. Member for Leicester should stand up as the champion of quarter sessions; he had always known that that Assembly was the Mother of Parliaments, but he had not known before that quarter sessions were the grandmother of the Home Secretary —that being the only inference he could draw from his hon. friend's speech. The Home Secretary's explanation of the manner in which he would make these rules was not at all reassuring. The Bill under discussion was not an uncontroversial measure dealing with factories or the regulation of mines; it was a measure so controversial in its character and so political in its clauses that the Government had had to adopt exceptional methods to pass it into law. And yet the Home Secretary, who was not only a great executive officer but a man of keen political perception, was to frame the rules! The proposal showed a great lack of trust in quarter sessions. They were not to be trusted to settle even the quorum of the committee! He was not previously aware of the existence of the Association of Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to consult, but it was certain to be a body of one political complexion, and in connection with the administration of a partisan measure such as that under discussion, it would be less capable than one would wish of that impartiality which was so desirable in a body by which the Home Secretary was to be advised. In Clause 6 Parliament was legislating not only by compartment but by Department. However valuable the Home Secretary might be as an executive officer, he was not the gentleman to legislate as provided for in this Bill. What was really meant by Sub-section (c)? Was it really intended that the Home Secretary, after consultation with the chairmen of quarter sessions, should regulate the application of the compensation fund? If so, the right hon. Gentleman would be able to override all the clauses of the Bill. Whatever the Home Secretary did ought to be subject to the control and authority of Parliament, and upon that ground he supported the Amendment.

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.) urged the necessity of securing uniformity in the rules of quarter sessions. In each of the counties of London, Middlesex, Sussex, and Kent the rules with regard to licensing matters were different, and it was most difficult for persons called upon professionally to go from one county to another to know exactly how to comply with the different regulations. If it had been proposed that the Local Government Board or the Board of Trade should draw up these rules he would have voted with the Opposition, because in those Departments the permanent officials controlled everything; but at the Home Office it was quite different. The Home Secretary was surrounded by experienced gentlemen who were able to give the intelligent construction which was so much required in these matters. He somewhat favoured the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon that the quarter sessions should meet and submit rules to the Home Office, but on the whole he thought the Home Secretary had made out his case for a meeting between himself and the representatives of quarter sessions for the purpose of arranging a set of rules. His main purpose in rising, however, was to express astonishment at the speech of the hon. Member for Leicester, who had made an heroic defence of quarter sessions. He had had the pleasure of reading the speeches of the hon. Member for some twenty-five years, and had followed his career with the greatest interest, and he noted that his defence of quarter sessions had only occurred since the hon. Member had been put on the commission of the peace for the county of Norfolk. ["Oh!"] He had a high opinion of quarter sessions when the removables were not on, but when he saw the way in which these gentlemen were brought up to support each other's local authority in cases where a local authority was trying to run down some unfortunate private individual, he had not that respect for quarter sessions that he used to have.

Mr. BROADHURST: Who are the removables?

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS said they were the gentlemen who sat for one year and upwards, the chairmen of urban and district councils, who as a rule were a disgrace to the bench. ["Oh!" and "Order."]

Mr. BROADHURST: On the point of order, Sir. I am not aware whether there is any Gentleman in this House who acts as justice of the peace in consequence of being chairman of a local authority—I am certainly not one—but at any rate I ask whether it is in order for an hon. Member of this House to charge justices of the peace with being a disgrace to the bench.

The CHAIRMAN: It is doubtful at any time whether it is a desirable thing for a Member of this House to make use of his position to violently attack private individuals. Personally I should very much like to see the rule considerably modified. But the rule does exist, and apparently a Member of this House may attack in any unmeasured terms anybody who is outside the House without any fear of the consequences. At the same time I think the hon. Member's reference to these gentlemen as being a disgrace to the Bench is rather a strong expression, and I hope he may see his way to modify it.

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS said any expression which fell from the Chair would have his sincere attempt at obedience. He would modify the letter of his observation, though the spirit would remain the same ["Order" and "Withdraw"]; they were not a disgrace to the bench, because the bench had been so altered now——

An HON. MEMBER: Withdraw generously.

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS said it was one thing when quarter sessions were represented by gentlemen like the hon. Member for Leicester or the hon. Member for King's Lynn, whose only idea, they knew, would be to administer justice, but quite a different thing when gentlemen of less experience acted on quarter sessions for a brief time. The Bill was to come into operation as soon as the Royal Assent had been given; it would therefore be absurd not to be able to bring the rules into operation until the meeting of Parliament or forty days after.

Mr. THOMAS SHAW (Hawick Burghs) expressed his high appreciation of the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon, which he understood to be that quarter sessions should be allowed first to make substantial regulations as to detail and procedure, and that after that there should be, if necessary, the imprimatur of the Home Office. He was of opinion that the precedent of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, cited by the Prime Minister, was really in favour, not of the clause under discussion, but of the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon. The present clause read—

> "A Secretary of State may make rules . . ."

whereas in Section 49 of the Act cited the words were—

> "Without prejudice to their other powers under this Act. A licensing Court may from time to time make by-laws as they think fit."

and Sub-section (2) provided that—

> "A by-law made by a licensing Court under this section shall not come into operation until it has been confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland."

The precedent cited by the Prime Minister for the clause was no precedent at all. He did not think it should be in the power of the Secretary of State to make the rules regulating the application of the compensation fund. That was a matter of statecraft. The idea of a defence being offered for this clause on the ground that it was a necessity of our Parliamentary procedure was another instance of the desire of the Government to transfer duties which properly belonged to Parliament to the shoulders of State officials. In these important matters it was now proposed to divorce the control of Parliament and relegate to a set of State officials at Whitehall the regulation, management, and application of the compensation fund. That appeared to him to be a matter on which the consent of Parliament ought to be taken. Quarter sessions might vary in their circumstances, and they might wish to make different regulations in regard to their procedure, and why should they not do so, and afterwards apply for the consent of the Secretary of State? That system was working well in Scotland, and it would give local authorities more power of initiative and less power to the Secretary of State. While he had offered these remarks in no controversial spirit, he perfectly understood that the scheme of the Bill was to give more power, jurisdiction, and control to the quarter sessions of the country. He did not, however, expect to find any supporter of the Government using the liberty, which they all had, to attack the personnel of quarter sessions in the language they had just heard. Amid all the criticisms of the Bill he knew of none which suggested that having regard to the character or qualifications of the personnel of the bench they were doing wrong in vesting them with these additional powers.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said he had always deprecated attacks on the justices who had to administer the law, whether in this country or in Ireland. He was afraid it was a matter of complaint that parties in that House did attack those who had no power to answer for themselves. That was a matter in regard to which both sides ought to be equally jealous, and he was afraid complaint as to the practice could not come from one side more than from the other. The Amendment before the Committee was that the rules ought to be laid before Parliament, and the Prime Minister had quoted the Scotch precedent to show that equally important rules were withdrawn from the cognisance of Parliament. The debate was now turning on the question whether the rules ought to be made by quarter sessions or by the Home Secretary, a matter entirely inconsistent with the Amendment. The hon. Member for Leicester, who had had some experience at the Home Office, said that they might strike out Clause 6 altogether and that the Bill would work perfectly well with the rules quarter sessions would lay down. If that were true what became of the argument that there was legislation in Clause 6. It was simply a question of which was the best method of procedure. Several hon. Members who had spoken had apparently forgotten that, in the course of the afternoon, he had accepted an Amendment by which quarter sessions were to be allowed to regulate their own procedure in the one important matter dealt with in Clause 6 which most properly appertained to quarter sessions. There were, however, some matters in this clause which ought to be left in the hands of the Home Office, and he could not see his way to alter the clause in the way which the hon. Member for Ripon had suggested. The hon. Member stated that the question of the renewal of the licence was a very important one. He wished to point out that they had already enacted that quarter sessions alone could refuse the renewal of a licence. If there was legislation in the clause he should be as jealous as any Member of the House of relegating it to a Department. But the matters provided for by the clause were all matters of a purely administrative nature. The question of delegating legislative powers to the Home Office was not at all involved. It was of importance, for the smooth working of the Act, that there should be uniformity of administration throughout the country, and that uniformity would be secured by the formulation of rules by the Home Office, which, of course, would act in consultation with the representatives of quarter sessions.

Mr. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) agreed that it was desirable to have uniformity; but the clause destroyed uniformity instead of achieving it, because it set aside the safeguard which Parliament had provided against abuses in the formulation of rules by a Department. This procedure was by no means new, and it had been almost constantly applied in this House. It had been of such constant application that not long ago an Act of Parliament had to be passed for the purpose of regulating it. He thought it was incumbent upon the Government to show that there was some special reason in this particular case why the method adopted should not be the usual method enacted by Parliament to be followed. Promises made across the floor of the House were very ephemeral, and were often forgotten. He protested against the abuse of legislation by rules where the Act of Parliament was set aside in favour of a loose statement made across the floor of the House. Up to the present when a final body of rules were fixed they were laid before Parliament, and when Parliament did not move an Address they automatically became law without any further trouble. Why was that procedure not to be followed in this case? There ought to be some explanation why it was not followed. The argument that this was a matter of machinery was beside the mark. On that side they acknowledged that there must be rules regarding details which could not be framed in the House and which must be delegated, but what they did not acknowledge was that the power of repudiation, provided for by the Rules Publication Act, should be absolutely taken away as it was by this proposal.

Mr. LLOYD WHARTON thanked the Home Secretary for conceding the suggestion he had made. He believed that a joint consultation between the Home Office and some members of quarter sessions would lead to the acceleration of a satisfactory settlement of this question. In that way they would get unanimity instead of each quarter sessions agreeing upon their own rules.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON said he interposed for the purpose of recommending to the attention of the Solicitor-General the compromise which had been suggested by his hon friend behind him. What his hon. friend proposed was that words should be introduced in the Bill requiring that the rules should be laid before Parliament. That would not in any way subject the rules to discussion in Parliament. It would not make them exempted business, and they could not come on for discussion after twelve o'clock, but it would bring the rules within the Rules Publication Act of 1893 which contained some valuable provisions. He asked the Solicitor-General whether he could not see his way to agree to this compromise and promise to introduce words so as to allow the rules to be laid before Parliament.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said he quite agreed as to the usefulness of the Rules Publication Act to which his hon. friend had referred. If there were any rules to be made under this Bill of the character and importance which required them to be laid before Parliament, he should at once accede to the request which had been made, but having thought over the matter, and knowing the importance of being able to revise the rules—because in the first instance they might be tentative—he really did suggest to the hon. and learned Member that there was nothing in the rules to make it necessary to go through the formality required by the Rules Act of 1893. The rules were intended merely to smooth the working of the Bill. They contained nothing to which any one could object.

Mr. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.) said he wished to make one observation in relation to the proposed method of procedure under the Bill. The Solicitor-General, following the Prime Minister, said this was purely a matter of machinery. He was not aware of any kind of statutory construction by which they could distinguish between what was mere machinery and what was a substantive provision. What was proposed by the scheme now before the Committee was to cast upon some Department a burden which rested upon the House itself, namely, to regulate the method by which that law was to be administered. What was here proposed was entirely novel, and he supposed it was due to the over-burdening of the Parliamentary machine. He could not accept the statement of the Solicitor-General that these rules were mere machinery, that there would be nothing of a substantive character in them, that therefore it did not much matter who made the rules provided he was someone competent, and that it did not much matter when they were made.

Sir EDWARD CARSON: They should be made as quickly as possible.

Mr. LAWSON WALTON said they had had experience in connection with certain recent Acts of Parliament, that where the framing of rules was left to one of the Departments of the State, the duty was not carried out. In this case they were getting rid of a burden placed upon them, and shuffling it on to the shoulders of some Department, but they were not laying down any period in which the rules should be framed, and they were not providing for checking them officially after they had been constructed. In connection with more than one statute they had had the will of Parliament reduced to futility, owing to the fact that an obligation placed on a Department had not been discharged. The Solicitor-General had said that it was undesirable that these rules should be left to quarter sessions, because they would lack the uniformity which ought to characterise rules of universal application. That was the very test which showed that they did belong to the sphere of legislation. The moment it was necessary that the rules should be of universal application they found a condition of things to which legislation, and legislation alone, was applicable in order to impart the uniformity to the system which was desired. If there was to be uniformity, he submitted that they at once invoked legislative authority in order to impose on a reluctant, or indifferent, or objecting jurisdiction, the will of some central authority. Was that to be the Home Office or not?

There was this important consideration, that when previous Acts of Parliament had been under consideration the rules had been framed before the Bill was introduced. He should not be challenging this method of procedure if the rules had been framed, but this legislation was immature, it was crude, it had not been fully developed, because the Government left to a vague and indefinite future the framing of rules which were essential to give effect to this legislation. In many Acts of Parliament during the past few years, schedules had contained the rules so that Parliament could consider them contemporaneously with the measure which was to give effect to them and add to them the sanction of law. He presumed that his right hon. friend would tell them that the rules had never been discussed. Therefore this was a new departure in legislation. He defied his hon. and learned friend to distinguish between what was substantive and what was procedure. He remembered that the House spent many hours in considering matters of procedure in connection with the Workmen's Compensation Act. The Committee had spent hours in discussing the details of this measure, but the whole legislation was to be at the mercy of the Home Department, which might make rules which would defeat the views of the House. As a constitutional lawyer he protested against these rules being forced on quarter sessions by the Home Office. When it was considered that it was essential that rules should be uniform and general in their application, then they had a legislative character and should find a place in a schedule of the Act. The rules should be laid before Parliament and subjected to Parliamentary review. Experience had shown how the intention of an Act might be defeated by the procedure adopted in putting it in force.

Mr. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said the time had gone by when the House could afford to spend hours in discussing procedure under such a measure as this. The duty of framing rules ought to be carried out by the Departments. The practice was to frame draft rules, then to consult a large number of people interested in the subject and invite suggestions from them for their improvement. He had no doubt that in this case the draft rules would be submitted to the chairmen of quarter sessions and others, and the result would be that a practical set of rules would be drawn up. If they were to frame rules by legislation, there would be a loss of flexibility and adaptability, and many mistakes might be made which could only be rectified with much difficulty and expense.

*Mr. AINSWORTH (Argyllshire) said that before they divided as to the whole clause, he might be allowed to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Solicitor-General to what he thought was a perfectly parallel case. Under the Education Act every educational authority was required to send up a scheme to the Education Department for approval. He would suggest that if the details were to be withdrawn from Parliament, every quarter sessions should be required to send up a licensing scheme to the Home Secretary, so that he might have every information before him, and be able to decide whether the scheme was one which would work in the circumstances of the locality.

Mr. DISRAELI said that in his very interesting speech the hon. Member for Hackney advocated the rules being framed, and carried out by the Department. They all knew that the hon. Member for Hackney got a Bill through the House which required considerable assistance from the Home Secretary, but no Judge or member of the legal profession would have anything to do with it. He must say that there was a good deal in what the hon. and learned Member for Leeds had stated in regard to this question. After the way the Home Office had behaved in regard to the last clause, he did not know that they were much to be trusted in carrying out these important regulations. He thought that such matters should be left to the decision either of this House or of quarter sessions. The rules were to provide for the provisional renewal of licences, and for the payment of compensation; to provide for the enforcement of any security for any borrowed money, and for its repayment; to regulate the management and application of the compensation fund, and the audit of accounts; to provide for the appointment of committees, the regulation of procedure in granting a new licence; and to provide for the authentication of documents. Now, these were matters which at the present moment were dealt with by the licensing authorities, and there was not one of those regulations which could not be framed by quarter sessions or petty sessions without the assistance of the Home Office. The Solicitor-General said that he wanted uniformity, and so the Home Office was to make rules and regulations; but on the previous day the Prime Minister said that he was in favour of variety, and for that reason petty sessions were to make their own rules and regulations. He did not understand that contradiction. He was very strongly of opinion that, whatever might be the merits of the Department in drawing up regulations, these rules and regulations under this Bill should be made either by the House or by quarter sessions.

Mr. BRYN ROBERTS moved to insert the words, "with the consent of Parliament." The simple effect of that Amendment would be that the machinery of the 1893 Act would be adopted. The Home Secretary would publish the rules provisionally, and after a certain number of days any local body might take objection to them. The Home Secretary would then, after considering the objections, publish them as final rules, which would be laid on the Table of the House and after a certain number of days they would become law, unless some Members objected. There was no objection to that method being adopted in this Bill. It would secure that the public would be heard, that quarter sessions would be heard, and that Parliament would have an opportunity of reviewing them.

*The CHAIRMAN said the proper course for the hon. Member to take would be to ask the hon. Member for Newmarket to withdraw his Amendment, and then to submit his own.

Mr. BRYN ROBERTS said he thought his Amendment would come after the rules; but he agreed to the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said he hoped the Solicitor-General would agree to some compromise on the point. Many hon. Members could not go the full length of the Amendment, but it was perfectly reasonable that there should be some method of publication before the rules became operative.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said that it was desirable that there should be no delay whatever in the preparation of the rules, and that there should be the greatest possible elasticity for revising the rules. He could not accept the Amendment.

And, it being after Eleven of the clock, the Chairman proceeded, in pursuance of the Order of the House of the 5th July, successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments moved by the Government of which notice had been given, and on every Question necessary to dispose of the allotted Business to be concluded on the 4th allotted Day.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 8, after the word 'committees,' to insert the words 'of quarter sessions and for the constitution of those committees where requisite as standing committees, and also for the addition to those committees in the case of a county, of representatives of the justices of any boroughs within the county not being county boroughs, but having a separate commission of the peace.'"—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Question, "That the Amendment be made," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 10, to leave out from the word 'procedure,' to the word 'and,' in line 13, and insert the words "of quarter sessions on the consideration of the reports of justices of a licensing district under this Act and on any hearing under this Act with reference to the refusal of the renewal of on-licences or the division of the amount to be paid as compensation.'"—(Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

Question, "That the Amendment be made," put, and agreed to.
